$0000000000000000000000 The Waiting of Mr. Horace

By Sarah Lindsay Coleman.

3 (Copyright, 1990, by the Authors' Syndicate.)

LL nature seemed joyous and A bright that afternoon, for spring had returned to Carolina. On every side dreturned to Carolina. On every side the iron plowshare had gone deep into the heart of the fields, and the earth had a fresh smell that caused a vague thrill of pleasure.

But Mr. Horace noticed none of these things as he rode slowly past the Bryson orchard. The sunshine accentuated the weary lines of his face, the dejected droop of his shoulders.

"Poor Mr. Horace," Mrs. Bryson said to her husband, as he passed her gate, "if ever a man was faithful, he But he will never win, and he knows it. I believe I will ask him for a setting of turkey eggs." She sped down the walk as nimbly as if she had been 20 instead of 50.

Mr. Horace brought his old gray mare to a halt, and waited for his neighbor to catch her breath.

"Turkey eggs?" he asked, with oldpoliteness, "certainly, madem." Mrs Bryson drew nearer, and in her earnestness caught the mare by the bridle rein. "Mr. Horace -Mr. Horace," she said, desperately. "It's not turkey eggs! It's been go ing on so long! You will never win! Why, you are a by-word for courting he the whole settlement, Mr. Horace." pleadingly, for he was looking down at her in such a helpless, bewildered techion; "Rouse yourself! Marry her in spite of herself! Good evening, sir." She ran back up the path to her

Mr. Horace jogged on. His face resumed its dejection, and his shoulders drooped sympathetically.

Twenty-five years is a long look back. He was a slim young fellow, fell of hope and youth, that first Sunday afternoon he rode up to Marv Hill'e gate, bitched his horse, and went in to begin the siege of her heart; and she was young, and the prettiest girl in all the county.

For ten years he had ridden to her house, and then had ridden away. The visits ended suddenly, and a month later Mr. Horace was married. Mr. Horace's little wife never complained, but at the end of five years the found the burden of life too heavy, and laid it down. It was ten years From the time of his wife's death. and 25 years from the time of his one foot behind him for his old-fashioned bow, he felt decidedly bewildered to hear the words: "Master her Why, you are a by-word for court-

He looked up to see if she had heard the loud-spoken words. was smiling and inviting him into the old-fashioned parlor.

"All alone?" he questioned.

"Yes," with a faint flush at the eagerness of his tone. And then she told him that the family were away for the day. With an impatient motion he passed his hand across his brow, as though he brushed imaginary cobwebs from his brain. "Now's the time! Marry her in spite of herself! Rouse yourself!" How the words rang in his ears. Re asked for some water, and when Miss Hill returned she dimly realized that a change had passed over him. Mr. Horace had pulled himself together, He sat down, and held himself erect. He spoke with a dignity new to him.

"Mary," he said, "it's 25 years since I first hitched my horse to your gatewest, and, as I look back, it seems all Sunday afternoons when I have come to see you." He grew eloquent. He even mentioned the rides through June sunshine and December snow, and the horse grown old in his service. She listened quietly-her delicate face calm. One would never have dreamed of the turnoil of her heart. Many a time when she felt that he needed a woman's care she had pitied him. She had worried est his stockings were not darned, his food well prepared. Grieved to the heart she sent him from her. Each Sunday she regarded her pretty faded face anxiously as she removed her hat and looked in the mirror, conscious of the fresh faces in their radiant youth that eccupied the pew behind hers. "I'm so delicate and nervous." It had always been her cry. "Your children need a strong will to govern them." "Yours is strong enough," he said,

"I could not be a burden, although I have money." She lifted her head in a proud way.

"Try me," he said. "See if I find you a burden."

"You don't understand." Her eyes filled with tears. "I will never marry the kind to run, you. I am too delicate!"

"You shall!" His lips took determined curves she had never seen before. "I have been a patient man, but now-

"There's the young minister," she rose, hurriedly, "Entertain him a few minutes, please," She slipped from the

"Marry her in spite of herself. Now! Now! Where there is a will!" He started as if an electric battery had charged him at the next thought. "No license needed." He greeted the minister quietly. The conversation moved idly as they waited for Miss Hill to come in again.

After she had spoken to her guest, Mr. Horace crossed the room to where she stood. His shoulders were well back, his head held high, his step that of a conqueror. "Brother Simms," he said, gravely, "you come at a most opportune time. My courting is the talk of the neighborhood, and we are going to put an end to the gossip."

"Mr. Horace, this is so sudden!" the minister gasped.

"Unlike my courting," grimly,

"But the family is away!" "It is Miss Hill I want to marry. Will you perform the ceremony, Brother

"Not without witnesses." The minister drew himself up with sudden ministerial pomp.

Mr. Horace stepped from the window and swept the landscape with anxious eyes. The clang of a cowbell cut the soft air. Old Ben was crossing the yard, his grandson, a boy of 12 or 14 years, following him. He came over to the porch in obedience to the summoning hand, and his eyes grew large as he entered the house with the boy. The cows were slowing filing through the barn yard gate. The sun had set, and its soft light filled the room. The minister opened a prayer-book. The expression on Miss Hill's face puzzled him. He remembered that she had said nothing.

"Miss Hill," the minister began. "Would I force her to marry me, Brother Simms?" Mr. Horace's eyes were full of entreaty as he turned them on her.

"Are you willing, Miss Hill?" "Yes," faintly. Then in clearer tones: "Perfectly willing." There was an exultant ring in the man's voice as he made the responses; the woman's voice was low, but audible. Ben shuffled forward and congratulated them; "but she don't act like herself," he muttered as he went out.

The minister's departure left them alone. Old Mr. Horace drew his bride to his heart and held her there in silence. A man has wisdom straight from the gods who refrains from speech at such a time. "Horace," Mr. Horace's wife's voice was full of regret. "If you had married me before-now I am old." He looked at her fondly, and they kissed each other, these middle-aged lovers. "What will they say?" she asked. "My people-and the neighbors?" A faint rumbling of wheels was heard.

"They will say old Horace Stringfield has asserted himself at last." He patted her hand, and chuckled as his horse's impatient neighing grew more frequent. "Old fellow," he called, and his voice rang like a boy's, "be patient. my waiting is over."

The May New Lippincott-

Paul Laurence Dunbar's new novel, "The port of the Gods," is published entire in the May "New Lippincott Magazine," This is by far the strongest and best fiction from a pen noted for its humor and pathes. 'Uncle Tom's Cabin" in its day held the reader captive, so does this novel of the new Negro, enfranchised but still a charge upon our consciences. Opening with a false arrest, trial, -so-called, -and conviction in a Southern town, the tale shifts to New York. Here the writer speaks from the heart when he says of the Southern Negroes who come North seeking their fortunes : "It was better for them to sing to God across the Southern fields," In the cases of Joe Hamilton and his pretty sister Kitty this was undeniably brick
