TALK NO. 9.

Development.

Every nerve and every muscle in the body may become developed by use or lose its power by disuse. One ear of the telephone girl gets sharper by constant listening, while the other ear becomes less sensitive. It is just the same with the eyes. If one eye is used to the exclusion of the other the one becomes sharper while the other loses its keenness. A child may be born with both eyes equally sensitive but with one of them's sight y out of focus. The good eye does all the work, the other does little or nothing. The good eye becomes developed while the bad eye gets worse. By the age of fifty the poorer eye will hardly distinguish between daylight and dark. The chances are that the good eye from double duty will evidently break down. The remainder of the person's life will be discomfort and irritation. Glasses worn in time would place both eyes upon an equal footing and keep one as strong as the other. I will answer any question you wish to ask about your eyes. I will tell you whether they are alike or not. I will charge you nothing for the information.
