In the second place, if the President is successful in leading the attention of the people away from practicable lines and into the realms of constitutional amendment he will, at least for the time being, preserve from further attack the all essential Dingley tariff schedule, the revision of which is so strongly demanded by the western members of his party. And, looking into the future, if the republican party can succeed in securing for the President, by constitutional amendment and congressional legislation, the control of the trusts, it will have converted his office into an autocracy which will render it almost impossible to unseat a president elected by that party. The whole trend of the Roosevelt administration, say leading Democrats, has been along the line of concentration of power in the White House. The attainment of the end advocated by the President would be the culmination of that policy. It is generally believed, however, that the American people are too shrewd to be misled and that they will recognize that the present incumbent of the White House, even if he be himself honest, is a menace to American deals and to liberty and that in this instance he is being made the tool of men who are far his superiors in forecast and sagacity. "Imagine," said a leading democrat, last evening, "the condition of the country with all power over trusts vested in the President and Mark Hanna in the White House. Mr. Roosevelt cannot serve longer than 1008 at most and after that Mr. Hanna, or some man of his type, will become the logical exponent of republican doctrines and the in-
