Most people know that if they have been sick they need Scott's Emulsion to bring back health and strength.

But the strongest point about Scott's Emulsion is that you don't have to be sick to get results from it.

It keeps up the athlete's strength, puts fat on thin people, makes a fretful baby happy, brings color to a pale girl's cheeks, and prevents coughs, colds and consumption.

Food in concentrated form for sick and well, young and old, rich and poor.

And it contains no drugs and no alcohol.

ALL DRUGGISTS: 50c. AND $1.00.

MONKEYS WHICH ACT LIKE MEN.

Die of Broken Hearts, Commit Suicide, Get Drunk and Are Arrested.

Why do men act like monkeys, and why do monkeys sometimes act like men? That question, in all seriousness, is receiving earnest consideration from Prof. B. G. Wilder, B. S., M. D., biologist of Cornell University, and other scientists who are endeavoring to trace the associate mouve which prompt monkeys to die of broken hearts, to commit suicide, to become intoxicated and disorderly, and to get arrested and sent to jail. Just like some human beings.

Prof. Wilder is confining his investigation particularly to Petro Barbuza, a remarkably intelligent chimpanzee, which was arrested after a protracted spree at Sayersville, N. J., and sentenced to the Middlesex County Jail at New Brunswick, N. J., for thirty days. He wrote first to Warden Charles Rogers of the Middlesex Jail, to get a history of the monkey's crimes, its pedigree and all the facts obtainable. He purposes to follow this up by a personal study of the monkey and by an examination of the animal's brain, in case Petro should die.

Petro, it is said, inherited a passion for alcoholic liquors from its father and has indulged whenever the opportunity presented itself. In its cups the chimpanzee was the soul of humor and mischief, which found vent in the uprooting of beds of flowers, playing "Peeping Tom" at second story windows, from the tops of telegraph poles, dropping pebbles and sticks on passersby and acting generally like one possessed of considerable brain and ingenuity, if not sense.

It is suspected that some of Petro's human acquaintances, knowing the animal's weakness, made it possible for the chimpanzee to imbibe more freely than was good for it. In consequence, it is said, Petro, previous to his arrest a few days ago, has been on a protracted spree, during which it had made life burdensome to several of the more timid residents of the town of Sayersville. Finally at the request of a person whose flower nose at one time, doctor?" "Usually about fourteen," replied Dr. Blair, "and then she would brush them off and begin all over again. Women certainly are heartless. Captain soon began to lose his appetite. In fact, nothing could tempt him to eat. I gave him hot-house grapes, choice liquors, rare plums and malt, but he refused to be coaxed to eat, and it is a rather serious case when an orang-outang won't eat." "Darwin says animals have love-charms and love-calls. Is that true?" "Yes, and the monkeys when in love are coy, jealous and show individual preferences and admiration for beauty."

Curator R. L. Ditmar, of the Zoo, said that the monkeys always showed great grief when separated from their monkey friends. "Why if August and Baldy, the two new chimpanzees, were separated they would die," declared Keeper Reilly. Come with me and see how they act when separated."

The keeper went behind the cage and opened the sliding door. He then took Baldy out and shut the door, leaving August alone in the cage. Baldy's eyes filled and then both monkeys began screeching and tugging at the little door to open it again. When the door was opened Baldy darted inside and the two monkeys embraced each other like human beings, chattering meanwhile like two reunited friends who had not met in years.

"Several other instances are on record in which monkeys have died of a broken heart. One of these was Jakey, of the New York Central Park menagerie. This little monkey lived for twenty-four years in the Zoo and was one of the happiest and liveliest inmates of the monkey-house. In June, 1904, Jakey and his mate, Melissa, were separated, and from that time Jakey's health began to fail. The animal grew sullen and morose and within a week was dead. The keepers said Jakey had died of a broken heart.

Dude, a member of the troupe of trick monkeys which appeared at Glen Island in 1903, died of a broken heart because after a surgical operation which involved shaving the Simian's face, the other members of the troupe shunned him.

Several months ago Robert Darwin a four-year-old monkey, a member of the Zoo company at Overton Park, Memphis, Tenn., committed suicide by deliberately lying down on the track in front of an approaching street car. Darwin had been suffering from a contagious disease and had been put in a cage remote from his companions. The monkey became melancholy and finally escaped from its cage. It hid for several days in the wooded district of the park and then made its way to the track in front of an approaching car.

Jennie McGregor, a small pet monkey belonging to Thomas McMasters, who keeps a saloon on Central Avenue, Jersey City, got into the bar-room in the middle of the night and became so intoxicated that she almost died. Before succumbing to an injudicious mixture of whiskey, beer, gin, brandy and bitters, she did considerable damage to the saloon, especially the glassware.

The exploits of a fugitive monkey which wrecked a flat in the Rue Blanche, Paris, a few weeks ago, in a fit of violent passion, recall the ferocious orang-outang in Edgar Allen Poe's story of "The Murders in the Rue Morgue."

Like the orang-outang, the monkey escaped from its owner and clambered into a strange house, where it destroyed valuable articles with almost diabolical thoroughness. When Mr. MacDonald, an English teacher, entered his fourth floor flat in the Rue Blanche at 222 east-cent-ed with a remarkable scene of ruin. Hats, coats and boots, were strewn about the hall floor in confusion. He walked into the kitchen and found every piece of crockery smashed. Broken plates and bottles littered the table, chairs and floor, knives and forks were wedged in the fireplace, and provisions of various kinds were mixed together in a most unpleasant manner.

Mr. MacDonald's desk had been plundered and valuable papers strewn about the floor, some of them ruined by ink. In spite of the widespread damage no valuables had been taken from the flat. It was evident that ordinary burglars had not been responsible, and Mr. MacDonald had no enemies who would destroy his effects out of revenge. He called in the police.

Investigation proved that a pet monkey with the appropriate name of "Coroner," had escaped from a house in the same street. It was evident that, after breaking the cord which confined him to a third floor room, he had clambered along the roots to the apartment house in which Mr. MacDonald lived, and entered the kitchen through an open window.

VAPOR BATH APPARATUS.

For breaking and curing a cold no remedy equals the good old hot foot bath recommended and used by our grandmothers. Nevertheless, the method of taking the foot bath could be improved, as suggested by an apparatus recently patented by a Washington man. As shown in the illustration, this vapor bath apparatus is far superior to the metal cabinets now in use. The apparatus consists of an ordinary chair, to which is attached a wire frame to support a suitable covering which, when placed over the frame, will entirely surround the person seated in the chair. The receptacle containing the hot water is placed in front of the chair's close to the feet. Vapors arising from the hot water, instead of escaping into the room, will be confined within the covering and come in contact with the person in the chair. The framework is adjustable, so that the covering can be arranged as close to the body as desired.
