

HOPE ON.

There was never a day so misty and gray That the blue was not somewhere above it; There is never a mountain-top ever so bleak, That some little flower does not love it. There was never a night so dreary and dark, That the stars were not somewhere shining; There is never a cloud so heavy and black That it has not a silver lining. There is never a waiting time, weary and long, That will not sometime have an ending; The most beautiful part of the landscape is where The sunshine and shadows are blending. Into every life some shadows will fall, But heaven sends the sunshine of love; Through the rifts in the clouds we may, If we will, See the beautiful blue above. Then let us hope on, though the way be long And the darkness be gathering fast, For the turn in the road is a little way on Where the home lights will greet us at last. -Morning Star.

CHAPTER XV.—CONTINUED.

Unconsciously Agnes had clung to Sprague's hand. Now, as the sense of danger disappeared, she became aware of what she was doing; and, in sudden embarrassment, she withdrew her hand from his reassuring clasp.

The artist, recalling the object of his visit, at once became grave and formal.

"I am sorry to intrude upon you at this unconventional hour, Miss Murdock, but I found this letter in my studio to-day. It was evidently dropped by you yesterday; and, thinking it might be important, I—"

"A letter? What letter?" asked Agnes, puzzled.

Sprague held out the sealed envelope. The young girl tore it open and cast a hurried glance at its contents. Then suddenly understanding, she tore the paper to shreds and threw these angrily into the fire which burned brightly in the large open fireplace.

"Oh, that!" she exclaimed, contemptuously. "And then after a pause: 'Do you mean to say you thought—'"

"She stopped short, seized by a sudden shyness.

"What else could I think?" said Sprague, softly.

He was watching the fragments of paper as they flared upon the hearth. The flame which consumed them seemed to shed a radiant glow upon his heart.

"Then," he added, presently, and still more softly, "if there is nothing between you and—him—perhaps—perhaps I may hope—Miss Murdock—Agnes—"

His hand sought hers and found it. But the reaction had come at last, and the brave girl who had been able to control herself in the presence of a threatening madman now gave way to a fit of hysterical weeping.

Sprague, not being a medical man, could hardly have known what remedies to employ in an emergency of this kind. All he did was to whisper soothing words in the young girl's ear and to kiss the tears from her eyes. But apparently that was enough. Evidently for a layman he must have possessed considerable medical intuition; for, after sobbing awhile upon his shoulder, Agnes quieted down gradually and remained contentedly nestling in his arms, while the artist, doubtless fearful of a relapse, continued, for perhaps an unnecessarily long time, to ply the treatment whose effect had produced upon his patient so marked, so rapid, and so satisfactory a result.

The attention of the medical profession is respectfully called to a treatment which, though empirical, may possibly possess specific virtues.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE ROENTGEN RAYS.

"I tell you, Sturgis, it is a wonderful discovery. I don't know what applications may ultimately be made of it in other branches of science, but I am convinced that it is bound to cause a revolution in surgical diagnosis," said Dr. Thurston, enthusiastically.

"Yes," replied Sturgis, "I have no doubt that Roentgen's rays will be of great assistance to the surgeon in the examination of features and in the location of foreign bodies which cannot be reached by the probe."

"As a proof of that, I must show you a beautiful photograph which I have just made. After leaving you on New Year's morning, I found a patient asleep in my office. He had been using several hours. It was the usual case of a pistol in the hands of a fool friend, who did not know it was loaded, and of course with the usual result—a bullet wound in my patient."

Sturgis was listening in an absent-minded way while his friend spoke.

"The wound was not severe; no bones broken. The bullet had entered the palm of the left hand and had passed up into the forearm."

A sudden light came into the reporter's eyes; but he maintained his listless attitude.

"Well, sir, probe as I would, I was unable to locate that bullet. At last I concluded to try the Roentgen rays, and here is the result. It is as pretty a shadow photograph as I have yet seen."

So saying, Dr. Thurston handed the reporter a photograph, which the latter studied carefully in silence.

"Notice how clearly you can see the peculiar shape into which the bullet has been flattened," said the physician.

"Yes," replied Sturgis, "I was observing that. Have you a duplicate of this that you can spare?"

"Yes; keep that one if you wish." "Thank you; I am very glad to have it. Did you succeed in extracting the bullet?"

"I have not tried yet. I had to develop the photograph first."

"Of course. When do you expect the red-haired young man to return?"

"He promised to come back yesterday, but he failed to do so," replied Dr. Thurston. Then, suddenly:

"But who said anything about his being young or red-haired?"

"Not you, certainly, old man," replied Sturgis, smiling. "Don't worry; you have not voluntarily betrayed any professional secret. But, for all that, your patient is wanted by the police. He was bound to fall into their hands before long. The only effect of this discovery will be to hasten the denouement. I had traced him to your house, and I knew how he was wounded; so that I recognized him as soon as you mentioned his case."

"Who is he?" asked Thurston. "I am sure I have seen him somewhere before, but I cannot remember where."

Whereupon the reporter related the story of Chatham's connection with the Knickerbocker bank case.

CHAPTER XVII. THE QUARRY.

Half an hour later Sturgis was walking briskly down Broadway, with his usual air of absent-minded concentration. Presently he turned into a side street and at once slackened his pace. He now sauntered along like a loungeur at a loss how to kill a long, idle day. The show window of a bric-a-brac shop arrested his attention. He stopped to examine its contents.

A little farther up the street was a liquor saloon, outside of which stood a group of boisterous young rowdies. An older man, evidently in his cups, was seated on an adjoining stoop, where, with maudlin gravity, he seemed to be communing with himself.

On the opposite side of the way stood a low, dilapidated brick house. A painted sign over the windows of the ground floor bore the name: "MANHATTAN CHEMICAL CO."

The drunken man rose unsteadily to his feet and approached Sturgis with outstretched hand.

"Say, Jimmy, get on ter his nibs strikin' de bloke fur a nickel ter git me 'cine fur his sick mudder!" exclaimed one of the young ruffians.

The wretched-looking individual thus designated seemed hardly able to stand as he steadied himself against an iron railing; but the eyes he turned upon Sturgis were bright with intelligence and the words he spoke were uttered in a low, firm voice:

"He's been here—been here twice." "Twice?" echoed Sturgis, surprised.

"Where is he now?"

"I don't know—"

"You don't know?"

"No, sir; but I guess Conklin does. This is how it was: It was my watch yesterday afternoon, when Chatham came the first time. He went into the Manhattan company's place through the basement at a quarter after five. So I just settled myself out here and waited. Well, I waited and waited, but there wasn't any sign of Chatham, and when Flagler came along to relieve me at ten o'clock Chatham hadn't come out yet. Flagler he spotted the place until six this morning, and then Conklin took his turn again until two o'clock, when I came on for my watch. Just as Conklin was telling me how things stood, who should come down the street but Chatham himself, large as life."

"Down the street?" exclaimed Sturgis.

"Yes, sir. And up he goes, as if nothing had happened, and into the Manhattan Chemical company's place again."

"He had put up the back-door game on you," said the reporter.

"Yes, sir; just what I said to Conklin. So, quick as a wink, I sent him around the block to keep his eye peeled on the next street, and I waited here. And here I've been ever since. If Conklin isn't on the block above, it must be because Chatham has made tracks again, and he after him."

"I'll go and find out," said Sturgis. "Has anyone else called at the Manhattan Chemical company's office since you have been on watch?"

"No, sir; but a couple of hours ago an express wagon came along and delivered a long wooden box; might have been chemicals for the wholesale department, for it was lowered to the cellar by the hoist in the area-way. The blond young man receipted for the box."

"Very well, Shradly. Hang on a little while longer, and I shall have you relieved just as soon as I possibly can."

So saying, the reporter, who had been pretending to look through his pockets for a coin, ostentatiously slipped a nickel into the outstretched palm before him. The light seemed to die out of the sharp eyes of the detective, and it was the miserable drunkard who staggered back to his place on the stoop next to the station, unmindful of the gibes of the young rowdies congregated there.

Sturgis walked up to the next street, where he found a second detective on duty.

"Anything new, Conklin?" he asked. "No, sir; he's been lying low; looks like he knew he was spotted this time."

"Good. Stay here until I can notify the police that we have run down the quarry. It will be necessary to obtain a search warrant for the Manhattan Chemical company's place. In the meantime, if Chatham should attempt to make tracks, hang on to him like his shadow and send back word here as soon as you can."

"All right, sir." Sturgis, after leaving Conklin, walked along the street which the detective was watching and carefully inspected every house on the block. Almost all were huge office buildings; but here and there an old-fashioned brownstone front stood out conspicuously against the broad expanse of brick walls and iron columns. Half-way down the street one of these old houses stood well back from the street line behind a small garden. The reporter stood near this and read the numbers on the adjoining buildings.

"This is directly back of the Manhattan Chemical company's office," he mused. "I wonder who lives here. It looks like a respectable place enough. One could obtain a good view of the rear of the Manhattan Chemical company's office from the back windows. H'm—"

He stood thoughtfully considering what pretext he could use to gain admission to the house, when suddenly he became aware of the presence of a man who had approached with noiseless steps.

"Ah, is that you, Mr. Sturgis?" said the calm, sardonic voice of Dr. Murdock.

The reporter started inwardly, but gave no outward sign of surprise.

"Were you about to do me the honor of calling?" continued the chemist.

"Yes," said Sturgis, deliberately; "I was about to seek an interview with you. Can you spare a few minutes?"

"Who is it that asks for the interview?" inquired Murdock, with quiet sarcasm. "Is it Mr. Sturgis, gentleman; Mr. Sturgis, reporter, or—"

Sturgis met a cold gleam from Murdock's inscrutable eyes.

"Or Mr. Sturgis, the famous detective?" continued the chemist with an imperceptible sneer.

"I represent the Tempest," replied the reporter, quietly.

Murdock glanced carelessly up and down the street. There was no one in sight.

"Oh! very well," he said, taking out his latchkey and leading the way to the house; "come into my study and let me hear what I can do for the Tempest."

On entering the house Murdock motioned Sturgis to the door leading from the hall into the drawing-room.

"If you will step into the parlor for a few minutes, I shall be with you directly," said he.

Sturgis nodded acquiescence, and while Murdock walked toward his study, which was at the extreme rear of the hall, the reporter opened the drawing-room door. He did not open it very wide, however, neither did he enter; for although the room was rather dark, his quick eye caught a passing glimpse of a feminine head cozily nestled upon a distinctly masculine shoulder, the owner of which had his back turned to him. Bachelor eyes though he was, Sturgis had not the heart to interrupt so interesting a situation; and, as the couple were so absorbed that they had not noticed the intrusion upon their tete-a-tete, he discreetly retreated and softly closed the door.

By this time Murdock had passed into his study, so that Sturgis found himself alone in the hall. He was glad of a short respite during which he might collect his thoughts; for, having been taken by surprise, he had not had time to select a plausible topic for the interview which he had solicited from Murdock. Not knowing that the house was that of the chemist, his sole object had been to gain admittance, so that he might be able to observe the Manhattan Chemical company's offices from the rear, and if possible to ascertain how Chatham had managed to give the detectives the slip the first time he appeared to them.

Now that he was in the house the reporter was confronted with the necessity of explaining his presence there without betraying his true purpose. This would not have been a difficult matter had the inmates of the house been total strangers; but he felt that it would be by no means so easy to offer an explanation which would be satisfactory to a man of Murdock's keen perception. And Murdock was the last person to whom he would have confided the true reason of his visit; not only because the chemist, as his opponent in the wager concerning the Knickerbocker bank mystery, was interested in thwarting rather than in aiding his investigation, but chiefly because he felt a strong instinctive distrust of the man.

As these thoughts were passing through the reporter's mind, he slowly paced the long hall, back and forth, with his hands behind his back. In so doing, he passed a door which was slightly ajar and caught a glimpse of long rows of bookshelves loaded with beautifully bound editions. The place was evidently the library. It occurred to him that a library is a public room and that he would be more comfortable in there than in the hall.

He pushed open the door and looked in. The room was empty. He entered.

The library occupied a space between the parlor and the rear room into which Murdock had entered, and it was separated from each of these rooms by folding-doors over which hung heavy portieres.

Sturgis was a lover of books; his interest was at once aroused in the collection before him. It was admirably selected from the standpoint of a philosopher and a man of science. Every department of history, of philosophy and of science had its section in which the volumes were classified and arranged with intelligent care. But curiously enough, poetry and art were but meagerly represented.

One section specially attracted Sturgis' attention. It was devoted entirely to the history of crime in all its phases and in all ages. Criminal statistics, criminal jurisprudence and the psychology of crime, as well as the biographies of all the noted criminals of ancient and modern times, were completely represented. Almost the only works of fiction in the collection were in this section, and included every book imaginable concerning criminals and their deeds. Many rare and curious volumes were there—some of them so rare that they could be found in only a few of the great libraries of the world.

Here Sturgis was in his element. He had himself collected a valuable library on the subjects kindred to his profession; but here were books many of which none but a Croesus could ever hope to own. He was soon absorbed in an examination of some rare volumes which he had often longed to possess.

While thus engaged he became aware of the murmur of voices from the rear room. As the words spoken could not be distinguished, he paid no special attention to them; but, instinctively, he noted that one of the voices flowed in the calm, even tones so characteristic of Murdock's speech, while the other, whose timbre and modulations were unknown to him, betrayed the repressed excitement of the speaker.

It soon became evident that Murdock's interlocutor was fast losing control of himself; for he gradually pitched his voice in a higher key, until occasional words began to reach Sturgis' ears. The reporter was not the man to wantonly play the part of eavesdropper; therefore, although the isolated words which reached him brought no connected sense, he judged that it was time to move out of earshot of the conversation to which he was becoming an involuntary listener. Replacing upon its shelf the book which he had been examining, he started toward the hall door. As he did so, he heard the now thoroughly excited individual exclaim in loud tones:

"I don't care a damn for the money. I only went into the scheme because you promised she'd have me; and, by God, if I don't get her, I'll give the whole cursed thing away."

Sturgis, who had reached the hall door, pricked up his detective's ears at these words. But in another second he heard the knobs of the folding doors rattle, as though some one had placed his hands upon them.

Quick as thought he opened the door and glided out into the hallway. He had not time to pull the door quite to behind him when the folding doors opened and he heard Murdock say in his calm, frigid tones:

"Perhaps you have done that already with your dulcet voice."

Had Murdock seen him? The reporter asked himself the question. Probably not; for he heard the folding doors close once more.

HETTY GREEN'S GREAT RICHES

It Took Two Years for Her to View the Properties on Which She Had Mortgages.

"Hetty Green's wealth, consists largely of government bonds, railroad stocks and mortgages," writes Leigh Mitchell Hodges of "The Richest Woman in America," in Ladies' Home Journal. "She says she is not so fond of government bonds since the finances of the nation have become polluted with politics. Good mortgages of any kind are now her favorite form of investment. If all the mortgages she holds were foreclosed to-morrow, 23 churches of various denominations, in almost as many states, would become hers, and four cemeteries would be added to her real estate. Besides these there would be blocks of great business buildings and splendid city houses, theaters, livery stables and hotels, country residences, farms and ranches, factory buildings and thousands of acres of valuable land in all parts of the country. Several years ago she made a tour of inspection of all the property on which she held mortgages. She spent two years traveling and stayed at 40 hotels in as many cities. Since then she has added largely to her holdings of this kind. The most conservative estimates place Mrs. Green's wealth at $60,000,000, but it is probably more. She herself won't discuss the matter, except to say that it is overstated."

Compatibility.

The wife of a Memphis gentleman asked him the other day to explain to her the meaning of the phrase, "incompatibility of temper."

"It refers to a man's wife growling at him when he comes home at three a. m."

"Indeed!" she said, "then I suppose compatibility of temper has reference to the kiss he will get if he comes home at the proper hour."—Memphis Scimitar.

Realistic.

Cooper—Hello, Rowland! Back from the southwest? How'd you come out with "Uncle Tom's cabin?"

Rowland—Too blamed hot down there for such a show. Why, man, in one Texas town the people were so frantic for something to cool their parched throats that they actually charged the stage and carried away the ice we had for Liza to escape on.—Buffalo Commercial.

No Trouble. Mistress—I think you will prove satisfactory. But I cannot engage you until I have consulted with my husband.

Maid—Oh, that's all right. I always get on perfectly with the men.—N. Y. World.

Senseless Pride.

Mother—What? Going to marry that fellow Ginsling? He's a bartender.

Daughter—Hub! You needn't talk. Your only son tends a soda fountain in a prohibition town.—N. Y. Weekly.

THE GREAT ANTHRACITE MINERS' STRIKE.

PICKING COAL FROM SLATE BANKS, FRENCHTOWN, PA.

HOTBEDS OF HERESY.

A Baptist Clergyman Thus Describes Two Prominent Colleges.

Southington, Conn., Oct. 6.—The adjournment of the anniversary meetings of the New Haven Baptist association was preceded by a lively debate occasioned by a sensational attack on the Newton Theological seminary near Boston, and the University of Chicago.

A resolution was presented asking that all the churches in the association be asked to take a collection for Newton Theological seminary. It was announced that John D. Rockefeller had promised to give the institution $150,000 if a similar amount could be raised in other quarters. Rev. T. A. Hanna, of Shelton, opposed the resolution in vigorous language. He said:

"This seminary and also the Baptist university at Chicago are hotbeds of heresy. Their instructors lead the pupils from the solid foundation of the old theology to the shifting quicksands of the new so-called scientific religion."

Mr. Hanna's remarks aroused a heated controversy. Rev. Mapleson, of Middletown, admitted that much that had been said was true, but added that many of the objectionable men had been divested of their power to do harm. The president of the seminary in question had assured him that in the future there would be no cause for complaint.

Other speakers defended the institutions attacked vigorously. A long debate was ended when Rev. W. G. Thomas moved the adoption of the resolution and this was done by an overwhelming vote.

Hanna and the Ice.

Chicago, Oct. 6.—Senator Hanna made merry yesterday over the stories about the "attempt to assassinate him." He said: "The facts are these: After I had finished speaking Thursday night a piece of ice as big as your closed fist struck the table in front of me and fell to the floor of the platform. I looked up and saw a hole in the top of the tent through which the chunk of ice had evidently come. That it was thrown at me is nonsense, as in order to do that a man would have to climb on top of the tent and it would not bear any one's weight."

A Woman's Crime.

New York, Oct. 6.—Mrs. Lillian Smith, of Inwood, borough of Manhattan, while insane Friday, shot her two children—Ethel, aged 12 years, and Theodore, aged 3 years, and then committed suicide by shooting herself. Another child lies in Fordham hospital at the point of death as the result of carbolic acid burns. Before shooting the children Mrs. Smith, with the cunning of a maniac, tried to force them to drink carbolic acid. Long brooding over the prospect of death is said to have been the cause of the woman's insanity.

Robledo Predicts Revolution.

Madrid, Oct. 6.—Senor Romero Robledo, who in 1896 was minister of justice in the cabinet of the late Senor Canovas Del Castillo, has caused a stir by a violent speech dealing with the political and economic situation of Spain. He declared that if matters were to continue long as they are now, revolution would be inevitable.

Vardon Is Champion.

Chicago, Oct. 6.—Before the largest gallery that ever witnessed a golf championship in America, Harry Vardon, ex-champion of Great Britain, won the United States golf championship from Great Britain's premier golfer, J. H. Taylor, by the narrow margin of two strokes on the Chicago Golf club links at Wheaton Friday.

Benjamin's Slayer Is Acquitted.

Lexington, Ky., Oct. 6.—Michael Moynahan, who shot and killed R. O. C. Benjamin, the negro lawyer, editor and lecturer, here at the registration polls on Tuesday, was acquitted Friday on the grounds of self-defense.

Fear a Mud Flood.

Managua, Nicaragua, Oct. 6.—The recent torrential rains have led the people of Managua to fear a repetition of the mud flood which descended from the neighboring volcanic mountains 24 years ago and covered the streets of the city to a depth of five feet.

Killed His Son-in-Law.

Wheeling, W. Va., Oct. 6.—M. F. Dryden, a prominent citizen, was shot and killed Friday by Thomas Workman, his father-in-law, in a family quarrel. Workman claims the shooting was done in self-defense.

A GAME OF DECEIT.

China Is Accused of Playing a Two-Faced Part.

MERELY TO GAIN TIME.

Edicts Degrading Manchu Nobles Were Insincere.

CHASED A RUSSIAN CRUISER

Chinese Warships in Formosa Strait Tried to Capture the Rurik, but the Russian Ship Was Too Swift and Escaped.

London, Oct. 6.—It is reported in St. Petersburg, according to the correspondent of the Times at the Russian capital, that the Chinese fleet in Formosa strait attempted to engage the Russian armored cruiser Rurik, but the latter's speed frustrated the plan. The correspondent says it is probable that the allied squadrons will force the Chinese fleet to capitulate, or will destroy it.

Shanghai telegrams announce that the imperial edict dated September 30, ordering the court to be removed from Si Gnan Fu, was issued owing to the famine at Tai Yuan Fu, capital of the province of Shan Si. They also express the opinion that the object of the recent edicts regarding the degradation of Chinese personages of high rank is merely to gain time and to enable China to be in a better position to defy the powers, as the new capital will be virtually inaccessible from the coast.

The Shanghai correspondent of the Morning Post, discussing this aspect of the case, remarks:

"The German troops have no means of transportation and any attempt to follow the Chinese court would be futile."

He says that the Chinese firmly believe in the existence of a Russo-German agreement under which Russia will take all the territory north of the great wall and Germany the provinces of Chi Li and Shan Tung.

The Times representative at Shanghai says: "It is believed here that highly inflammatory edicts are being issued secretly and that the recent public edicts are only intended to hoodwink the powers."

Rome, Oct. 6.—The Tribuna publishes a dispatch from Taku, dated October 4, which after confirming earlier reports of the brilliant behavior of the Italian force of 500 men in the attack on the Shan Hai Kwan forts, says that a mistake occurred between the Russians and the French, who fired upon each other in the belief that they were assailing the Boxers, and that several were killed and wounded on each side.

A Strange Request.

Pana, Ill., Oct. 6.—Judge Righter, of Shelby county, has received a letter from Ralph Corti, an Italian, asking permission to fight a duel with Peter Camali, a fellow countryman, who, the former claims, stole $290 from him while working in the mines at Mowence last year. Corti begs that they may be permitted to step off ten paces and shoot at each other until one or the other falls dead.

Lula's Denial.

Chicago, Oct. 6.—Lula D. Hay, of Jacksonville, Ill., has sent to Senator Jones, chairman of the democratic national committee, a sworn denial of the story alleging that she knew W. J. Bryan to have been paid $150,000 to cause a silver plank to be incorporated in the Kansas City platform.

Killed on the Street.

Washington, Oct. 6.—Tom Tolliver, a gambler, was shot and killed in the crowded streets last night. Joe Slavson also received a shot that may prove fatal. Jos Massey is in jail, charged with the crime. Slavson was a bystander.

A Protest from Rome.

Paris, Oct. 6.—Le Journal publishes a dispatch from its Rome correspondent saying that the Italian government has sent to Washington a protest against the "excessive liberty" accorded to anarchists in the United States.
