Answers to many inquiries.

On the 26th of December friends were startled to learn that Mrs. Morris Lewis was lying in a deep sleep, from which it seemed unable to rouse her.

Dr. Smith was called. He decided it was a general breaking up of the whole system, and said her condition was precarious, but not hopeless.

She continued in this state until the following Monday, when she rallied, and we had every hope of her recovery.

On Wednesday she sank back into a comatose state again, and continued so up to the hour of death, Jan. 3, 1901.

Mrs. Lewis was the oldest of eight sisters, being 73 years and some months of age; a quiet, conscientious woman.

She was possessed of a comfortable farm home and here dispensed such lavish hospitality, that it became the resort of many indigent persons.

In decided contrast to the older sister, was our fair-faced sister, Mrs. Goodwin. She enjoyed active life to a degree seldom met in middle life.

Church work was her delight. Christmas festivities, socials, innocent merry makings always found an advocate in her.

The frosts of sixty winters had bleached the hair, but had never aged the heart of our merry sister Sue.

Though very much worn by attendance on our deceased sister, she, as was her wont, braved all and went to see a sick relation for whom she had grave fears.

Seeing she had but a short lease of life remaining, Susan approached her as to the future, and gained her consent to see a minister.

No messenger handy, she took that long walk up to the Wesleyan parsonage and sent a man of God to complete the work she had begun, pointing an erring one to a merciful Savior.

This was her last well day, when gently chided for over fatigue, answered, "I could not wait one moment, when a precious soul was to be saved.

The blessed assurances Flora left, will be ample recompense if my life goes out at this time." Lost her life in the salvation of a soul. Oh! my sister, empty handed you did not go into the presence of your God.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox advises a young man who intends to marry, to study the girl and find out if she is the one he wants. Ella need not have gone to the trouble to give such advice. Young men have been pursuing that same sort of study from time immemorial, and notwithstanding their investigations and observations, they have invariably failed to learn the truth until after marriage.
