Republican State Convention.

To the Republican electors of Pennsylvania:

I am directed by the Republican State Committee to announce that the Republicans of Pennsylvania, by their duly chosen representatives, will meet in Convention at the Opera House, in the city of Harrisburg, on Wednesday, August 21st, 1901, at 10:30 o'clock a. m. for the purpose of nominating candidates for the following offices, to-wit:

One person for the office of Justice of the Supreme Court.

One person for the office of State Treasurer.

In accordance with the rules governing the organization, the representation in the State Convention will be based on the vote polled at the last Presidential election. Under the rules each legislative district is entitled to one delegate for every two thousand votes cast for the Presidential Electors in 1900, and an additional delegate for every fraction of two thousand votes polled in excess of one thousand.

By order of the Republican State Committee.

FRANK REEDER, Chairman. W. R. ANDREWS, Secretary. C. E. VOORHEES, Secretary.

EDITORIAL MENTION.

Well, if the country is warm, it has at least also made it warm for the Weather Bureau.

Can't the National Educational Association get Andrew Carnegie to endow the National University for them?

Perhaps Mr. Bryan would rather talk than eat, but it is certain that most people would rather eat than listen to him talk.

Possibly it is true that the Boers are burning and looting, but it beats us to imagine what the British can have left for them to destroy.

A New York State teacher is being tried by his school board for heresy. He went to New York City and had a hot bird and a cold bot.

Mr. Bryan now gets his reward for stamping Ohio for the state ticket on several occasions. The people there have gotten to know him and act accordingly.

King Edward has cut the "kissing of the peers" out of the coronation exercises, but unless he has changed mightily, we'll wager he has left the "kissing of the peeresses" in.

Crowninshield claims that he wrote Dewey's orders, but he has nothing to say about the authorship of Sampson's famous dispatch. Yet Sampson didn't write it. Who did?

Minister Wu has asked recompense for outrages on his countrymen by white boxers in this country. Fie! Fie! Mr. Wu! You ought to know too much to try such a bad joke on us.

Edward Atkinson has abandoned his amateur politics and taken up amateur theatricals. Probably he is wise. At least he cannot know less of the latter than he does of the former.

General Kitchener reports that he would have captured President Steyn, if, etc. We all remember what would have happened, "If the dog hadn't stopped, etc."

While Tom Johnson isn't entirely satisfied with the consolation prize he pulled at the Ohio convention, nevertheless he snickers every time he remembers that he might have been treated as Bryan was.

After all, the British ideas of Boer resistance were not much more at variance with facts than those of Secretary Seward, who said the South would be whipped back into the Union within ninety days.

Texas is pointing the finger of scorn at the doctors who told her that oil would abolish mosquitoes. She has provided the oil but the mosquitoes seem to revel in it. They are worse there this year than has been known for years.

BONA DeROCK

Fiddler and Hunter of the Upper Genesee.

TRUE HUNTING STORIES.

A Single Shot that Struck Three Deer - The Chase of Old Golden - A Home-Made Violin.

From Buffalo Express.

Closely following the Seneca Indians, who had sold their title to the Canadea Reservation and gone, most of them, to the Buffalo, Tonawanda, Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, came a class of hardy adventurers, many of whom, enamored of frontier life, were much given to the chase. They were the born children of the woods, brought up as it were, with rifles in their hands, and were acquainted with the nature and habits of all the kinds of wild animals which then infested the big woods of Western New York.

The days of the wolf and bear had passed and the fleet deer, so plenty in the days of Bill Bennett and the Indian hunters of old Canadea, had become scarcer and more and more wary of their stealthy foes, which called for more patience and a higher degree of skill on the part of the hunter to get a shot at the timid creatures. This contributed considerably to the excitement of the chase and gave it a fascination scarcely known to the earliest hunters, and added correspondingly to the fame of the successful hunter. Especially was this the condition along the valley of the Upper Genesee, and the veteran hunters, like the Kingsleys, Cooleys, Butlers, Van Nostrand, Ballocks and Old George Parke, who had tracked the deer over hills and valleys, over crags and precipices even, had been forced into retirement by the infirmities of age, and were no longer able to endure the long-distance chase.

At this juncture came the De Rocks, fresh from among the hills of Delaware County, where they were born and raised. They were a strange mixture of blood. Of Spanish, French and Indian ancestry, they inherited many of the peculiarities and characteristics of their several strains of blood. The family name descended from the French. There were a number of the De Rocks—Reuben, now 86, and Cyrus B., 80 years old, were the ones most marked as hunters. Cyrus would hardly be known by that name, as he had always been known as Bona, a name which his father bestowed upon him in admiration of Napoleon Bonaparte, and which Cyrus made still more appropriate in choosing his first wife, whose name was Josephine. The coincidence abruptly stopped there, as Bona's Josephine was not divorced, as was the great Napoleon's.

Rube and Bona were remarkably good shots, and was not long after their appearance in Canadea before they knew and were thoroughly acquainted with all the features of hill and dale, of mountain and valley, of stream and gorge, of the Upper Genesee country for many miles in all directions. They were fleet of foot, excelled in endurance, and their exploits soon became the talk of the day, and excited the admiration, and, in some instances, the envy of the few veteran devotees of the chase who still lingered in the territory of old Canadea.

One of Bona's first adventures in the Allegany woods happened one morning when he shot a deer which the old hunter Parker had started. He dressed it, and hid the carcass under the fallen trunk of a big tree. Parker, following, found where it had been killed, but failed to find his venson, though sitting for awhile to rest on the trunk of the self-same tree.

One time Rube shot a deer which fell dead, scarcely leaving his tracks. Upon examination no mark of the ball could be found. The post-mortem examination revealed the ball lodged between the shoulders, having pierced the heart, whither it penetrated from the rear. The deer had persisted in standing with his head away from the hunter, who, tired of waiting for a better exposure, let drive with remarkable result.

Rube once caught a young fawn and tamed it. It came to be very fond of the place and family. The writer well remembers seeing it about the premises. It would come into the house at meal time and the family would feed it what it liked from the table. It was soon a great pet. It became passionately fond of apple pie, so much so, indeed, as to be a nuisance, a real bother. So they shut the fawn out at meal time. One day while they were eating their dinner from a table standing in front of one of the windows the young deer appeared and looked in. Quickly discerning his favorite apple pie he took the shortest course to get it. Result, considerable confusion and innumerable fragments of window glass. This young deer strayed off a little too far one day and some roving hunter, mistaking it for a wild one, shot it.

The De Rocks made a finish of the deer hunting business on the Genesee about 40 years ago. Game becoming so scarce on the Genesee, Bona for some years practiced going to the Pennsylvania woods and camping out through the hunting season. The most wonderful shot Bona ever made was in Pennsylvania. Getting sight of a deer on a side hill below him, among some fallen trees, he fired. It was a doe, and it ran away bleating like a lamb, and soon laid down and died. Coming down to where the doe stood when shot he found, behind a big log, a buck whose back had been broken by the ball and was dragging its paralyzed hind parts along as best it could, while still further on was a fawn shot through the bowels. It was no particular credit to Rona though, for he had seen only the one he shot at. It was a case of pure chance. But he killed seven more that day, which was the biggest days achievement.

One time, somewhere in the neighborhood of Keating Summit, Bona and one Horace Stiles hunted a week on a strife, not a wager really, but the one who killed the greatest number of deer during the time was to have the best buck the other killed. Bona shot Styles was some years younger than he, and was accounted an exceedingly lucky hunter. If the term can be applied to hunters, Bona scored 21 and Styles 20, just as close as it could be and not tie.

Bona once had Jeff Brown of Wilcox send to the factory and get him the barrel, lock and trimmings of a Winchester, 44 caliber and 28 inches long, at a cost of over $35. He stocked and sighted it himself, using for the stock a piece of black walnut taken from the last tie that was laid when the Union Pacific Railroad was completed. He obtained the wood from an engineer on that road, to whom it was given as a souvenir. The engineer had taken to drinking, spent all his money and parted with it to Bona for $1, after having refused $50 for it. With that gun at ten rods Bona once planted ten balls in the same hole in a tree. Cutting the wood away revealed a ragged mass of lead well stuck together by the force of the impact.

Tired of hunting in Pennsylvania, where game had become scarce, Bona relinquished the chase, and went to the region of the Carbon coal mines in Wyoming and engaged in watching snow sheds on the Union Pacific Railroad. While there he killed two grizzlies, a number of black bears, several of the kind called crabeaters, many antelopes and a few deer. Questioned about killing the bears and grizzlies, he says that was all without particular incident. He "just shot them, that's all."

Bona claims to have killed at least 2,000 deer, and in one season made a score of 102. He shot his last deer four years ago. His eyes are good, and so are Ruben's, and they can still hold a gun as still and tight as well as anyone. In his 80th year Ruben was present at a turkey shoot at Belfast. In this instance they paid a certain sum for a shot, but not at the turkey, using a mark instead of the live birds employed in the old days. Ruben asked one of the crack shots of the place if he would let him shoot his gun once. The request was granted. After asking some questions about the gun, it being one with which he was not acquainted, Rube fired and, to the astonishment of the crowd, drove the nail in the center of the mark. They did not want him to shoot any more. Nor did he want to. He had secured a good fat turkey at a very reasonable price, and at his age did not care to risk his reputation for a shot which might possibly have had a slight element of chance in it.

The writer well remembers in the old days of the Christmas and Thanksgiving turkey shoots, when the live birds were put up, how Bona and Rube used to take the turkeys. When they have in sight the word would go round the crowd that the enterprising manager would lose some money on them, and he did, and soon felt that he would like to bar them from shooting.

But Bona's reputation as a fiddler is scarcely less than his fame as a hunter. For 60 years and more he has played that wonderful instrument. The elder people of the upper Genesee remember him well, having often danced after his music, when they were young of "Money Musk," "Virginia Reel," "March Four," "Pop Goes the Weasel" and other dances of 40 and 50 years ago. His violin has been the sweet voice of many an otherwise lonesome evening while camping out, and to-day he can wield the bow and finger the strings with dexterity which is surprising in an octogenarian. Last winter he played for a private dancing party in the neighborhood of his old home. He lives now in Kane, McKean County, Pa. His playing is all by note, and his ear is so good that he was able once last winter to play to good satisfaction for two or three hours with one of our leading orchestras.

Bona not only plays the violin, but he can make, and has one which he has just completed, which he showed the writer not long since. Its front is of the despised hemlock and back of beautiful blister maple. It is of skillful workmanship and a fine-toned instrument.
