When Thomas A. Morrison was discharged from military service in 1863 he had but one arm which he used to work out his way in life. It was what might be considered a serious handicap to be so crippled. But the Venango county young man was not discouraged. He did not wait for something to turn up. He studied law and became a successful attorney. Since '87 he has been occupying an important judicial position and now is elevated to a higher court. Judge Morrison's experience has demonstrated in a practical manner how success may be achieved under difficulties and how determination and well directed effort may accomplish their ends.—Bradford Era.
