The St. Louis World's Fair as a Great Educator

It Is More Valuable Than Months of Study or a Trip Around the World. Accommodations for Visitors Moderate and Ample a western college, stopped beside me.

"Magnificent beyond the dream of man," said I. "More than that," said he. "Do you with amazement at the many things know," he continued, "to me the greatest thing of this truly great exposisat thing of this truly great exposition is the educational influence it will have upon the millions who visit it.

Here in two weeks' time one can gain more practical knowledge of the kind that will be useful to him in the struggle with the world than he can get in law years' time in any university. The two years' time in any university. The are the products of the earth's harvest college education is entirely different fields. In this one building, big enough college education is entirely different from the kind of education one gets by seeing things, but for practical purposes the 'seeing' education is quite as necessary as the book learning. We consider a trip to Europe as a great educator, but a trip to Europe cannot be compared to a trip to this exposi-

St. Louis .-- I was standing on the their coast that such battleships guard, Plaza St. Louis, admiring the scene and the battleships are theirs. And that stretched away into the distance it is a semi-proprletary satisfaction before me, ending with the magnificent spectacle of the Cascades. I needed no ure that any American evinces in gazcompany, for the great exposition all ing at the processes or results of the around me was sufficient, but as I stood many government activities he sees exthere an acquaintance, the president of a western college, stopped beside me. ploited here. A visitor will observe a hundred interesting novelties; he will leave the building—only to go back later for another look—round-eyed statements of my college friend might be enumerated almost without end, and all would but tend to prove that the Louisiana Purchase exposition is the greatest educator of the age. We read the histories of the years to learn of the world's progress, but here we do not have to read, we see it. In the Transportation building we see the primitive locomotives that pulled our first railroad trains, and standing beside them we see the powerful, intricate machines that perform the same service to-day. That is an education in the progress of railroading. In the Electrical building we find the first primitive electrical appliances, and beprimitive electrical appliances, and becage, in London or any other large side them the many intricate machines city, but be it said to the credit of that are to-day being driven by this these hotels, they are no high these notes, they are no higher priced during the exposition than they were before it. The masses of the people are looking, however, for something among other things, of the products of the various contributions. of the various countries. Here we see The people of St. Louis are playing the of the various countries. Here we see them. The book learning we forget, what we see we remember. Take, for example, Japan. We are interested in the progress of the island empire, we wonder at her greatness, we read volume after volume to learn of her progress. Here it is all spread out before our eyes. We see the same Japan Commodore Perry saw when he broke the bars of darkness that shut the empire from the world, and we see beside pire from the world, and we see beside it the Japan that is to-day waging war with one of the greatest nations of the world, the same Japan that is an important element in the world's commerce. It is an education in the progress of Japan that no books can possibly give us.

And so it goes through all the great exposition palaces, through the foreign government buildings, through the state buildings, and down the Pike. Everywhere is a new and valuable lesson easily learned and never forgotten, for we learn it by "seeing To refer again to the United States government building and its exhibits as an educational feature, I want to quote a part of a paragraph from the current number of the World's Work that well illustrates the educational point I make. This is it:

"Watch a party of visitors from a Mississippi valley state, people who have never seen the sea, as they wander through the passages of the battleship model or squint along a rapid-fire gun on deck, across an imaginary ocean. The shine in their eyes betrays a mixture of excited interest and pa-triotic pride. Far though the coast may be from their homes, it is yet American.

tion. Here is shown the best of all fruit. There are towers and pagodas countries, and to see all that is shown here is to see the best from the countries of all the world.

"As for our country what could be "As for our country, what could be grains, wheat-straw and wheat-heads and wheat-grains; and there are fig-our government building? After seeing ures in cotton and butter and sugar it we understand far better than we and prunes and nuts. There are deccould have before both the system and orations in wavy moss and hemp, in uses of government. Take the Philippine exhibit as another example. A know at last the wealth of each state pine exhibit as another example. A know at last the wealth of each state half day's time spent within its walls is more instructive than a dozen text books. We are entirely too apt to read and forget, but when we see we remember, and here we see."

Examples that would bear out the statements of my college friend might be enumerated almost without order.

Two Injuries.

Perhaps the man who maltreats a book, even by accident, deserves to pay for it twice over, and logically he may sometimes be called upon to do it. daily newspaper says that a borrower recently handed in a book at a public lending library, and the attendant thereupon discovered a hole in one of the leaves.

It was necessary to enter a description of the damage in a book kept on the counter. A clerk entered the title and number of the book, and the attendant described the damage thus

"Page 215, a hole." Then he turned the leaf and added: "Page 216, another hole."-Youth's Companion.
