Veils are seldom worn now with the picture hat; those that are used are of the finest tulle.

A great deal of fur is to be used on the winter millinery, but it is too early to think of this just yet. As a matter of fact, fur on the head is nearly always too heavy to long remain popuable to make almost anything becombeing turned back with a deep cuff of the same lace. The skirt, althought of velvet, was arranged in a series of gathers, finished with an enormously thick ruche of velvet round the hem. The effect was really very good, though it sounds a trifle heavy.

Debutantes are still wearing shaded chiffons and shaded taffetas, which charming evening frocgs. A pretty model for a youthful bride was in brown shading into orange, the skirt arranged with a series of gathers alter-nating with tucks, and much befrilled and flounced round the feet. The plainer petticoats are trimmed with bright-colored silk braids, and braids of every kind may be included in the list of the season's trimmings.

Purple and mulberry shades compose ome of the new tollettes de visite. These again are mostly of silk trimmed with velvet, and many princesse robes are being made through their popularity is by no means assured. Many "Empire" frocks of lace will be made With underdresses of satin, very often edged with fur. Very beautiful is the lace coat for evening wear, embroider-ed with panne and lined with chiffon. Edgings of sable and bands of colored velvet also form effective trimmings for the evening wrap. Of course, the real novelty of the sea.

son is the paletot or redingote. This forms a useful wrap and is sometimes of the same stuff as the dress beneath, but the best samples are in silk and satin, though later on these will be re-placed by veivet. Some are trimmed with marabout, some with fringes and embroideries. I have seen one really old-fashioned looking black silk paletot lacing up the front, with a quaint ruche down either side, and the collar and sleeves edged with black silk fringe.

These paletots show the short shoulder and a sleeve that is tight at the to it, but the paletot at the present moment is a somewhat unbecoming gar-ment in spite of the beautiful fabrics in which it is made. It is a useful length for furs, and I have already seen some models in grey astrachan, also in Persian lamb, edged with ermine.
