CHAPTER XXXIII.
Olive Dumbarton spent a wakeful, restful, and troubled night, vivid and scaring thoughts she was powerless to banish.

CHAPTER XXXIV.
In March Mrs. Dumbarton was back in town, but not to the house or to the district which was fraught with such terrible associations and memories for her.

CHAPTER XXXV.
And here, in this house which welcomed her by its brightness, its air of old-fashioned solidity, its promise of comfort, she met George Bostock for the first time since his accident.

CHAPTER XXXVI.
The previous night the inspector had returned from Paris, whither he had gone to ascertain for himself if Valerius had been there on the night of the Hoxton Road tragedy.

CHAPTER XXXVII.
When in due time a jury had returned a verdict declaring Valerius Galbraith guilty of the death of David Dumbarton and the innocence alike of Olive and George Bostock was established.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.
Again and again Headwick had felt prompted to tell him of Galbraith's confession, but that he feared to disobey orders.

CHAPTER XXXIX.
Bostock looked at the speaker fixedly, anxiously wondering, but made no reply.

It was in the early summer that Quinton Quave, looking shy and nervous, came to tell Olive Dumbarton that, just having been taken into partnership by his father, he was now in a position to marry.

"She says we must be engaged for twelve months before we may marry."

"We haven't entered into our engagement yet, you know. That always begins with a kiss."

"Must ours?" she asked, pouting prettily even while she raised her flushed face to his.

"I should be shocked to hear you intended to marry two or three," replied Olive, who could not keep from laughing.

"I fear I am rather foolish," he stammered; "but what I meant to say was I love no one, I never have loved any one, but Veronica—and—"

"Yes," he answered, impressed by the gravity of her voice, "that would be terrible, but I cannot imagine it happening to Veronica or to me, for I love her very dearly, and she—"

"Twelve months is a long time," he said regretfully, "and I thought—but never mind; it won't be long passing if we may see each other continually. Thank you. I can't tell you how happy you have made me. I will go and tell Veronica now, and starting up, he went towards the garden, where he knew the girl was waiting for him.

"How long you have been. I thought you were never coming to tell me? What has mother said?" Veronica exclaimed in nervous impatience as he drew near.
