Senator Depew told a little story on himself and Senator Root in a speech at a dinner in Washington to Mr. Root by the New York Republican congressional delegation.

and as there proved to be both money and useful publicity in it Nye was grateful and used for years to remem-ber the major with characteristic notes, one of which had the following exhaustive signature:

Old Times at the Capital. In recalling the lively and picturesque incidents which the old timers enjoyed in Washington one is moved almost to tears over the commonplace nature of his own times. John Adams used to bathe in the Potomac every morning at daylight because he had no bathtub in the White House, and no one ever pulled a kodak on him. President Taylor used to walk about the town and stop and chat with every one he met, like a policeman. A reception in the White House in these days is relieved of monotony only by the great crush of guests, who trample the clothes off one another's backs. Another president set up in the east room a 600 pound cheese and invited the multitude to come in and help itself, which the multitude proceeded Fat and Thin.

The two women encountered each other at a dance. They had not met for several years.

"How thin you have grown!" ex "How fat you've got to be!" the oth er cried, and they stood gazing at each other in some dismay.

"Before you come to blows," remarked a mutual friend who stood by, "let's take a vote as to which is worse, to get too fat or to get too thin."-New

Craftsman Homes

The Permanence and Beauty of Cement House Construction Are Pre-eminent.

"It lends itself equally well to every kind of architecture, domestic or business building, and recently several very beautiful chapels and churches have been constructed from it."

By GUSTAV STICKLEY.

EMENT if rightly handled is the most adaptable of building materials. It is capable of carrying out the gracious, rambling lines of a country cottage as well as the sharp angles and square corners that we have come to associate with cement building by reason of our familiarity with the Spanish-American type of house. It lends itself equally well to every kind of architecture, domestic or business building, and recently several very beautiful chapels and churches have been constructed from it. It had as a building material in the sections of the country where the climate was more severe certain disadvantages which are one by one being removed. The large quantity of sand added to the cement in order to make it cheap enough for building purposes prevented it from being waterproof, and the question of coloring offered many difficulties, for it was not only impossible to force the paint or stain into the pores of the cement, but the chemical composition of the material affected the pigment and the oils used in the paint, causing the coloring matter either to fade to a mere tint of the original color or to rub off.

Recently, however, several preparations have been found which when mixed with the cement or applied as a coating to the finished building render it proof against damp and rain. Professor C. E. Pellew, who is at the head of the practical chemistry at Columbia university and who has made the subject of dyes a particular study, has been experimenting for us in the matter of giving concrete a permanent color, and the result of his successful tests will appear in the Craftsman Magazine. He has been searching for some method of coloring both by applying the coloring matter to the surface and by mixing it with the body of the concrete before it is used in building that will not modify the texture of the material and will not fade. He has produced some very satisfactory results, especially in dull reds and red browns, and his investigations should go far toward giving us a more artistic cement architecture than we have as yet had. We hope that the information will prove of use to every one interested in concrete, either as a building material or for other manufactures. While constant experimentation is perfecting cement as a manufacture, the increasing number of factories for making it is rapidly reducing the cost. It is now only a little more expensive than wood, but as it does not require skilled labor in its handling this extra expense is more than offset by the amount saved in constructing a house.

porches, the old fashioned dormer broken through the main roof to give the necessary height to the chambers,

The woodwork which is visible on the outside of the house is of cypress and has been treated with a wash of diluted sulphuric acid, which slightly corrodes the surface and gives it a delightful shade of brown. This tone rounds it.

The cottage at the head of this article shows how adaptable this material is to an informal domestic architecture. The long slopes of the roof, the deep

FIRST FLOOR PLAN.

The walls of the house are stanchly constructed. Truss metal laths, a sort of woven metal sheathing, are fastened to the studs of the house. On either side of the laths an inch thick covering of cement is placed, making a two inch outside wall with an air chamber the thickness of the studs between it and the usual lathed and plastered wall of the intecustom to cover the studs upon which the metal laths SECOND FLOOR PLAN. were fastened and then cover with cement. But the changes of the weather caused the wood to alternately swell and shrink, and the unyielding surface of the cement became cracked and in time fell from the walls.

In the building of this cottage every care has been taken to avoid leakage. The cement is brought up closely about the window frames, only the wooden sills showing. These project from the walls of the house and are slanted slightly so that the water does not stand upon them. The porches also are floored with cement.

I intend to take up the matter of windows and their arrangement separately in later articles with other similar features of the house, for naturally the details that go to complete a building, such as porches, windows and decorative structural effects, are secondary to the consideration upon which the main construction depends. But in a cement building the placing of the windows is an even more important consideration than in any other sort of house because of the severity of the walls, and attention is called to the variety in the size and the graceful proportion of the windows of this house.

The interior plans show a very attractive and comfortable arrangement of oms. The door leading from the pillared porch enters the hall by means of a small vestibule. The main body of the house contains a dining room, kitchen and well appointed pantries. The living room occupies the entire ell. This house illustrates particularly well the Craftsman principles of large open spaces, full of air and light, rather than separate small rooms. room, living room and hall are practically one large apartment and from every point of view show something of interest, either an attractive window or a graceful piece of furniture. Indeed, the amount of furniture that is built into the rooms will considerably lessen the cost of furnishing so large a space. In the dining room we find that the expense of a sideboard has been saved by the very convenient one, flanked on either side by china closets, that is already built in beneath the windows. At either end of the living room is a broad window seat, and there are four good sized bookcases. In the deep inglenook running out between the twin porches that connect by French doors with the room we find also deep, comfortable settles built in beneath the windows. This inglenook is one of the most attractive features of the house. The chimneypiece is of split field stone and the hearth of rough tiles. Upstairs, where ever the windows are broad and low, seats have been placed also. Everything has been done to make the house appear as comfortable on the inside, ever

Now that various methods of cement construction have been successfully carried through the manufacturers are turning their attention to the decorative possibilities of the material and have been particularly fortunate in sarden accessories.
