WHOLESALE TRADE EXCURSION

Start will be Made April 26, and Four days will be spent in New York and Pennsylvania.

Will Visit Emporium Friday, April 29th at 10:30.

Buffalo News.

The Wholesale Merchants' Association of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufacturers' Club today announced the details of its big trade excursion which will start from Buffalo Tuesday, April 26th, for a four-day boosting mission. A train of eight or more Pullman cars, a party of 100 representative business men to 25 cities and towns of Western New York and Pennsylvania. A combined capital of nearly $100,000,000 will be represented on the excursion.

The route as shown by the accompanying cut will take the trade boosters to Dunkirk, Westfield, Ripley, North East, Erie, Waterford, Union City, Cory, Cambridge Springs, Meadville, Cochranton, Franklin, Oil City, Titusville, Warren, Sheffield, Kane, Johnsonburg, Ridgway, St. Marys, Emporium, Port Allegany, Eldred, Portville and Olean.

The object of the Association is to cultivate the wholesale trade and territory naturally contributory to Buffalo and thus make the city as important a jobbing center as Chicago is in the Middle West, or St. Louis in the South-west. This first excursion is intended to give the executive heads of the large wholesale houses an opportunity to meet personally their customers throughout this part of the country.

The preparations are elaborate. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars will not cover the cost of train equipment. It will be composed of dining car, compartment cars, sleepers and observation coach, each in charge of an appointed officer who will enforce strict rules on the excursionists. The train will be equipped with office facilities for use of officers and members, and a small press will issue daily reports of occurrences in towns last visited as well as describing the main points of interest about places yet to be seen.

Several years have elapsed since Buffalo has sent out a trade excursion. The last one was signally effective and proved that an expedition like the one now in hand can accomplish wonders for the commercial interests.

The most remarkable feature of the excursion is the men composing it. All the firms participating will have one or more principals on board. The proprietary heads are going.

The publicity committee of the association has prepared much advertising for distribution on the trip and booklets of facts about the advantages Buffalo possesses as a jobbing center will be sent to business men of the various towns to be visited. Appointments will be made with them in advance.

The officers of the association say this is only the beginning of a plan to stimulate the entire commercial interests of the city and they expect that it will have a far reaching and pronounced effect.

Mr. R. Kuehne, our energetic Fourth street merchant, has been in correspondence with the Buffalo Association and has caused to be prepared important data relative to Emporium and vicinity, hoping thereby to interest some of the live Buffalo capitalist in our numerous natural advantages. We would suggest that our Board of Trade wake up, shake off the dust and get in touch with live business men, when Buffalo capitalists make us a visit.

Craftsman Homes

Simplicity as Seen In the Pioneer House and the Twentieth Century Bungalow.

"The bungalow of today is a building that meets the highly civilized needs of the modern family, and yet how simple it is compared to any previous form of country architecture."

By GUSTAV STICKLEY.

A YOUNG man came with his bride to consult a friend of mine in the matter of building a house. "Miss Schmidt wants a house like this," said the young man, displaying a picture of an elaborate frame house covered with fancy shingles, bulging with towers and balconies, the type of architecture that had a brief but extensive vogue twenty years ago.

Then, turning to his bride, he said: "Mr. Jones says that people of refinement do not build houses like this any more."

"Perhaps they don't now," answered the girl, looking proudly at the picture in her fiance's hand, "but the Muellers have one, and I have always wanted a house like this."

The house that she wanted was of that period of self conscious effort to produce something artistic in the line of house building. This stage is present in the development of any art and inevitably follows a period where beauty has been produced unconsciously and therefore unappreciated. It inevitably is followed by a third period of beauty consciously produced, the products of which show the spirit of the first period, finding a more complete expression because of the power that has been gained over the means of expression during the self conscious struggle for beauty.

For example, of the Craftsman houses I am now building the one which I think will attract the most attention is a bungalow built of logs. It has the rugged structural features of the pioneer house, but, of course, with modern conveniences added. Who twenty years ago would have thought of building a log house except for a child's plaything or for a rough camp?

It is chiefly because we are slowly being educated to an appreciation of the beauty which we had unconsciously produced and which for that reason we did not consider beauty. Necessity made the pioneer embody in his house many of the fundamental principles of good architecture.

But as time passed and the necessities ceased to be so impressive men came to look at their houses as symbols of a man's prosperity and power rather than as protections, and they set about beautifying them. They tried to make artistic structures that reflected credit chiefly on the owner's purse and the architect's knowledge of foreign building. Fortunately this type of house soon demonstrated its drawbacks.

While we were struggling under the general conditions that allowed such a form of architecture even for awhile the cry for the simple life arose. This made us think, and we were aided in reaching our conclusions by the development of the interurban trolley and the automobile, which took us into surroundings where at least a simpler life was possible. Here, our appetite ready for country pleasures, we found no architecture that satisfied our ideal.

We had to think for ourselves, and, with no precedent to blind us, we asked ourselves for the first time just what kind of a house would really satisfy us. We intended to get the most of the country that we could. A part of our reason for going there was to have life easier and more natural, and we tried to build a house that should help to make it so, that should bring the outdoors within our walls. We have done this, and the moment that we began to build for our real needs, to work out the influence that our surroundings exercised upon us, we returned to the fundamental principles in home building and again produced simple and artistic houses, but with this difference, that these structures have the simplicity of knowledge, while those of the previous days had the simplicity of inexperience. We have added the conveniences necessary to modern life without destroying the harmonious character of the house. The bungalow of today, for example, is a building that meets the highly civilized needs of the modern family, and yet how simple it is compared to any previous form of country architecture.

To illustrate this let us examine the drawing and plans for the bungalow offered as the fourth in the series of Craftsman house plans which I am contributing each week to this paper to be at the entire service of the reader. In this house we have an unpretentious but durable and attractive little building which is fitted for any situation where a detached house can be built. It is low and broad in general shape and for that reason might stand in a level field or, as suggested in the picture, upon a hillside.

The foundation and chimney are of split stone or of cement. The house is covered with hand split shingles, the roof with a rough slate finished with a ridge of tile. All of these materials have a rugged texture which imparts a look of durability and strength to the house. The windows are arranged in groups to admit the greatest amount of light and air and are casements, with the exception of one or two double windows that give variety and grace to the groups. The twin porches are floored with cement so that they are easily kept clean by use of the hose and make a pleasant variation from the usual long porch. The further advantages of the arrangement may be seen in the floor plans.

A long living room runs through the center of the house, the rear wall containing two French doors leading out upon a pergola porch, and the front wall between the two little porches is almost entirely windows with a low seat and bookcases built in below. From each porch a French door leads into the room, so that this end of it is practically a continuation of the porches, but sheltered slightly from the air. Thus one can be in the house and yet easily talk to the people on either porch. The kitchen opens directly upon one of these, which will make it cool and airy in summer. Behind this is the laundry. On the other side of the living hall are two bedrooms and a bath. One end of the living room is used as the dining room; but, if desired, the kitchen might occupy the position of the laundry and what is now the kitchen be used as a dining room. On the second story a big sleeping balcony occupies the center of the space, protected by two dormer roofs on either side of the ridge. An attic opens from each side of the balcony, which may be left rough and fitted with bunks and hammocks as a sort of barracks or finished more conventionally. The house throughout lacks no necessary conveniences and yet is as simple and open as the house of the early pioneer.

Central Literary Society.

A very successful literary society came to a close, last Friday evening, April 8, 1910. This society was held in the school house at Sinnamahoning, Pa., every two weeks, on Friday evenings. It has been in existence since before Christmas. Some excellent programs were rendered, consisting of songs, hymns, solos, orchestra music, orations, recitations, dialogues, public addresses and debating. A paper termed "Central Gazette," was published in addition to the debates and read at every meeting. Large audiences assembled to hear the talks and music, thus encouraging those still more, who had taken part. Everybody is well pleased with the work that was accomplished and say that it was not in vain, but that much educational benefit has been derived from it.

Some of the questions which were discussed during the winter are:

"Resolved, That United States Senators should be elected by direct vote of the people."

"Resolved, That women should have the right of Suffrage."

"Resolved, That Immigration should cease."

"Resolved, That Country Life is preferable to City life."

"Resolved, That Man has contributed more toward the advancement of Civilization than Woman."

A spelling match was held one evening instead of the debate. Several school teachers started the society and the parents and many others, beside the pupils, took an active part. The co-operation of all, helped bring about its success. We extend thanks to all who participated in the movement.

Many Emporium Citizens Have Discovered it.

Just what to do when the kidneys are affected, is a question that concerns both young and old. Was kidneys neglected in childhood lead to lifelong suffering.
