["ORIGINAL"] "MY PRETTY MAMMA"

I have such a pretty mamma sleeping quietly upstairs,
 With her hands as nicely folded as she keeps them when at prayers,
 With her hair, so soft and shining, parted smoothly from her face,
 And a wreath of flowers fasten'd there to keep it in its place.

She is looking pleased and happy, and I think she dreams of me,
 For she smiles a little, as she does when I am on her knee;

When I went to kiss her softly, very carefully I step'd,
 For my papa often told me not to wake her when she slept.

But I couldn't hear her breathing, and she looked so white and still,
 That I went and whispered to him that my mamma must be ill.

I was sorry when I told him, but I did n't want to cry,
 For he says it is n't mainly for so large a boy as I;
 But I guess it made him pity me to see how hard I tried,

For my great big papa drew my hand upon his breast, and cried,
 Then he said she was n't ill, but only sleeping where she lay;

And I think he told me, after that, she'd have to go away;
 But I'll go as well as mamma, for he promis'd me I should,

Oh! to stay with her forever, if I tried to be as good. LINNET.

OUR FOREIGN LETTER.

Correspondence of the Cambria Freeman.

PARIS, September 1, 1868.

The American who visits Europe for the purpose of sight-seeing will do well when landing at Liverpool to do the places between that and London, upon his way to the great city, and also before leaving England's boasted city, see all the interesting sights to be found therein, before crossing that narrow water, the English Channel, and seeing Paris; for Paris, the heart and soul of France, once seen, with its beautiful buildings, its elegant shops, beautiful shops, and its gayly dressed citizens, London, with its dark, soot-begrimed old houses, its narrow, crooked, and often dirty, streets, its sombre-looking inhabitants all dressed after the one pattern, (and in American eyes, a peculiar pattern), loses nearly all the charms it is at first possessed of in Paris, only Paris, is then enjoyed. Obsolete the manner of the dress of those around him in Paris, a New Yorker would be unable to determine that he was away from home, so closely do the styles of dress in the two cities resemble each other. It seems strange that with New York city three thousand miles from Paris, and London two thousand three hundred miles away, the dress of the New Yorker more resembles that of the Parisian than the difference can hardly be detected, while that of the Londoner is so different and peculiar that he is known in a moment. Johnny Bull, notwithstanding the warm weather, and it was fearfully warm in London during the summer, dresses in a manner that material, buttons his coat closely about him, wears around his bony neck a cravat, composed of about a square yard of silk, and clasps upon his head the inevitable black silk high hat, and with a flower in his button hole, saunters out to swell in the heat; while the Parisian uses superior material for his clothing as keeps off the heat, and the cravat, which his dignity forbids he do a straw hat, or a low-crowned hat of any other material, so it is in keeping with the balance of his dress, (or good taste seems to crop out at all times,) and seems to be prepared for whatever season the weather may bring. A few such warm seasons as the one that passed might have the effect of causing a change in the style of John Bull's attire, for during the past season numerous letters were sent to the Times suggesting that gentlemen set the example and discard clothing unsuitable to the season, in the hope that the lower classes, whose occupations do not seem to be exposed to the heat, might follow their example thus set them. But I started to say something of Paris, and must do so.

Paris, no matter when it was first founded, for authorities differ about it, or whom it was named after, for here again there is a difference of opinion, is certainly the headquarters of European luxury and pleasure, and offers to the visitor the noblest houses, the most imposing streets, the finest pleasure grounds, and has the greatest variety and best regulated amusements of any city in the world; and yet, notwithstanding the position now occupied, improvement is being made, and the attractions multiplied every year. Old houses are being torn down, and in their stead new ones of most beautiful design and elegant finish are erected; old streets are "wiped out" of existence, and beautiful broad avenues take their place; while the finest opera house the world has yet seen is rapidly being completed, at a cost of $3,500,000, gold. The situation of the city, especially those parts bordering on the sluggish river Seine, can hardly be considered good, yet so perfect is the system of drainage and sewerage, that anything like sickness from this cause is not known. The streets from this cause are so clean and swept that one may walk for miles in the carriage way, and soil the most highly polished shoes in many cases I have seen the carriage ways scrubbed as foot-walks are scrubbed at home, with broom and water. So smooth are the streets that the smallest ponies draw the carriages, and the "Society for the Cruelty to Animals," and that seemingly without effort, and one is almost inclined to think that carriages used here would never need repair, but when their term of service was ended that they went to pieces like the "Wonderful One-horse Shay." Most interesting museums, and collections of all that is interesting in sculpture, paintings or curiosities, (the Louvre Museum being probably the finest collection in the world,) are open to the public free of charge, and beautiful gardens, abounding in shaded walks and cool retreats, with charming fountains constantly playing, and excellent music discoursed at certain hours of the day, are to be found all over the city, and are fully made use of, for at certain hours all Paris seems to turn out and heartily enjoy what is offered. All this of course costs a great amount of money, which the people have to pay; but they do not complain, and do not grumble and discontent, no evidence of it are shown to the casual visitor, and as a proof that the people have confidence in the government, the real to obtain a share in the late loan is cited.

I was passing, late at night, along the Rue Rivoli, on which is situated the Hotel of the Marquis de Financiers, and upon the side-walk in front of the building was gathered a motley throng of the lower class, numbering I can scarcely say how many. Some were chattering as only the French can chatter, others were smoking their pipes or cigars, or eating a frugal lunch, while more were quietly sleeping upon the stone side-walk. The crowd attracted my attention, but I passed on. For three nights in succession did I notice the same thing; but on the third evening the crowd was so large that a squad of sergens de ville, or police, was on duty to preserve order. On this occasion I made inquiry, and found that these people were only waiting for the arrival of the loan, who, taking time by the forelock, had come early to stay all night, that they might be on hand in good time on the morrow.

The sight was a singular one, and if these people are of the dissatisfied, and are only waiting for the opportunity to cause a change in government, can they say they exhibit a strange desire to get rid of their money? Among the better classes whom I have met, the pride they have in their beautiful city seems to sanction all expenditure of money for improvements such as I have mentioned as taking place; and to the poorer classes the money is generally given in the form of a pension for the taxes paid, to say nothing of the pleasure they take in the public gardens, &c.

During the summer season the Parisians nearly all seem to live out of doors. On all the principal thoroughfares, and in fact on all streets, were located cafes and restaurants, where coffee, and other refreshments, &c., &c., without limit, are dispensed to the thirsty ones. In front of these establishments upon the sidewalks are great numbers of small tables, around which sit those who refresh themselves, and in the open air, in full view of the world, they may be seen sitting and talking, and they have seen fit to order. It is quite "the style." Everybody does it, and nobody finds fault with it. Coffee with cognac is the favorite drink, seemingly, but ashyne is to a seemingly fearful extent disposed of, and considering the fact that an abstinence drinker is about as common as water, it is not surprising to find a number of Frenchmen on the way to ruin. The rotation of meals which a Parisian usually observes is about as follows: Upon rising, generally pretty late, he has a cup of cafe au lait, (coffee with milk,) a petit pain, (small roll of bread,) and possibly some butter, (always unsalted,) and if in season, a few radishes; about 12 o'clock he has his breakfast, or luncheon, of bread and meat and a bottle of wine; between five and six o'clock he takes dinner, consisting of about three to five courses, and during an hour or so later takes half a cup of coffee without sugar, (always unsalted,) and if in season, a few radishes; about 12 o'clock he has his breakfast, or luncheon, of bread and meat and a bottle of wine; between five and six o'clock he takes dinner, consisting of about three to five courses, and during an hour or so later takes half a cup of coffee without sugar, (always unsalted,) and if in season, a few radishes; about 12 o'clock he has his breakfast, or luncheon, of bread and meat and a bottle of wine; between five and six o'clock he takes dinner, consisting of about three to five courses, and during an hour or so later takes half a cup of coffee without sugar, (always unsalted,) and if in season, a few radishes;
