THE DRUNKARD'S LIFE. The Atlantic Monthly gives the following graphic sketch of the daily experience of every drunkard: The daily life of one of the steady drinkers is like this: Upon waking up in the morning, after a heavy, restless, disturbed sleep, he is miserably lonely, unclean and almost helpless. In very bad cases, he will see Goulton, and his hand will tremble so that he has a doubt almost immediately which he had a doubt almost immediately can control his muscles, and get along without betraying his condition. After about an hour, and drinking every ten or fifteen minutes he will usually be able to get a pretty good breakfast. This breakfast, consisting of coffee, tobacco, and a few drops of brandy, will be able to get up. After breakfast, for some hours he will generally be able to transact routine business and associate with his fellows without betraying his piteous condition. An occasional drunkard is advertised on the streets, and mountain sides as letters, telegrams, and name, offered to the public, and some behind bars in drinking saloons, some certificates of physicians attached, and some in the hands of the law. Some of these cordials, wines, etc., mixed with other flavors to suit the taste with a few drops of spices and sugar, and sold under the name of tonics, restorers, appetizers, etc. Many persons are induced to take them, believing them to be beneficial, when, if they take them, they will find them to be one of the most pernicious and dangerous of all drugs. It is vain for advocates of these worthless preparations to speak of labor for reform, for the shameful business is carried on, and the money to be found to sustain it. These bitter labors, the torpid spirits, the morbid, feverish, and anxious, enables the victim to eat even a substantial dinner. The false excitement is temporary, but dinner remains, and it has to be earned. This calls for an occasional trip to the store or four hours, after which the victim is exhausted, and the man's daily maintenance is reduced to a minimum. He is in a steady drinking until he can get up, when he stumbles home to sleep, and the stupefying fumes, and awake at the door and decrepitude of a drunkard's condition. It is not surprising that smoking pipes are becoming disgusted with the use of tobacco. The old-fashioned, the worst liquors disguised as medicines, but lure the tippler on to ruin and destruction. CURE FOR HYDRUPHOBIA. - Written with a relative at High Street, N. Y. I was bitten by a dog supposed to be rabid, at once applied pulverized charcoal to the wound, and has experienced no inconvenience from the bite since two weeks just following the occurrence, which time he had some of the highest quality of beer, while living in Iowa, was the saving the life of a young lady, who the young lady subsequently applied some remedy for a rattlesnake bite, and with entire success. The pulverized charcoal is to make a paste mixing with lard. HOW TO MAKE BLACKBERRY WINE. Following recipe for making blackberry wine is furnished the Country Gentleman, Charlottesville, Va., homekeeper. One gallon blackberries; wash them in wooden tubs, of North Haven, Conn., every gallon of juice, thus obtained, add one quart of water to the pomace. Stand several hours, stirring constantly. Then strain and mix with the pomace. To every gallon of this mixture add one pound of white sugar, and strain through a fine muslin. Put in a large bottle, corked, and allow to stand for a week. The wine is ready for use.
