

Story of a Deserted Mansion.

Not far from Morristown, N. J., and situated on what is known as the Madison road, may be seen a large and fine house, standing in the middle of extensive pleasure grounds, bearing the marks of having been the abode of persons of taste and wealth.

Where once were flower beds and rare plants, now browse stray cattle; and pigs by the score root to their noxious content on the soft turf of the lawn.

On the floor of what has been evidently the library, tramps or miscellaneous boys have lighted fires, whose flames were looked upon by the doors of cubboards, stair railings, and other small pieces of woodwork of the house.

The plaster centre ornaments of the rooms have been the mark for the intruders to shatter empty bottles and stones at, and all are greatly damaged.

The thieves in the neighborhood soon found out the rich field, and at night pillored it. The constables hearing of this, laid in wait in the house one night, and arrested three men as they were rolling up fine pieces of carpets for the purpose of taking them away.

Some friends seeing the peculiar state of feeling of its owner, removed the balance of the furniture to a safe place, and the house remains open. Had persons congregate there, and the house at night is supposed to be the resort of thieves and robbers.
