> A CURIOUS CALCULATION. - The average value of each immigrant arriving in this country has been frequently estimated by writers on political economy, but no two of them agree on this question. This value varies from $750, according to the lowest estimate, to about $1,500 in the highest; but in either case it is evident that in a more estricted material sense it is cheaper to import our population than it is to produce it urselves. Assuming each child of fifteen o have cost $1,000, and that the money thus expended would have been otherwise saved, we find that the man who has raised a family of five children and remained poor might have accumulated a sum sufficient for the wants of old age had he not been subjected to this expense.
