That was a noble oration of George William Curtis at Concord yesterday, worthy The Troy Press tells the following of the noble theme and the noble men who strange story concerning the busband of a shed their blood on the spot, but it has one election to be held at the North. We call conspicuous and damning fault. It raises universal, and it does it in an offensive and intolerant way. We do not know for a fact, but it looks, after reading some of the passages in Mr. Curtis' oration, as if "Eugene Lawrence" was a nom de plume of his, and his able brain the hand that guides the pencil of Mr. Thomas Nast. Mr. Curtis, aving carefully consulted the statistics of the Burcau of Immigration and the reports of the Commissioners of Castle Garden, the country is now either immigrants or the children of immigrants. This immeuse foreign influx has brought with it, be says, an "immense ignorance." "It has brought," he continues, "other political traditions, other languages, and other religious faiths. It has introduced powerful by immigration that we owe the first serions questioning of the public school system, which was the nursery of the early republie, and which is to day the palladium of free popular government." It will not do man-that the original settlers of this parent stora of four-fifths the human forest he yesterday swayed with his eloquence; but everybody is not so learned as he. The Paritans were doubtless the salt of the colonics, and their descendants are probably the best citizens of the Republic, but they have no right to usurp all the fille in the sacrea temple of Frædom, or to constitute themselves an exclusive guard for its keeping. The blood shed in the Revolution was not all of one hare. That had been English that was spilled in Massachusetts; that was Dutch in New York; German and Scotch-Irish in Pennsylvania; Swede in New Jersey; there was pure Irish in Maryland ; envaluer English in Virginia ; Huguenot in the Carolinas, and Alastro-German in Georgia. The glory of the achievement belongs to no one of our thirteen tribes; and we will have no High Priests of Israel, nor Levites bearing the Ark of the Covenant essence of our being is democracy. The men of '76 did not distrust one another because some were English and some Irish, some Datch and some Austrians, some French and some German. They came here in search of freedom, and they found it ; the foreigner of to day comes here in search of liberty, and it shall not be denied him, no matter what he his political or religious conviction. QUITE an interesting controversy has whether the first shot was fired, or the first blood was shed, at Lexington or Concord, one hundred years ago to day. Mr. Charles Hudson, the author of a history of the locality, has written a letter on the subject, in which he states that the fight it Concord took place at the old North Bridge at half-past nine o'clock on the morning of the 19th of April, 1775, and that at Lexington, "so called," at two o'clock in the afternoon, after the British had been driven out of the former town, and when Percy's reinforcements arrived from Boston. The Lexington fight was, therefore, only "a continuation of the Concord fight, but assumed larger military proportions by increased strength on both sides, and the presence of two pieces of artillery with Percy's troops." George W. Curtis, although agreeing with Mr. Hudson as to the main facts in the case, differs somewhat with him as to details. He says that after the sixty or seventy militiamen who formed on the green at Lexington had been fired on by the British troops, the former were ordered to retire, "and as they did so returned the British fire.' The consequence of this is that the people of the two places will hold rival celebrations to-day, but as both are entitled to the honor of almost simultaneously opening fire on the British forces, it is to be hoped that the rivalry between them will not be as bloody as that which took place between the militiamen and Pitcairn's forces. In the meantime, in order that they may be fully satisfied in regard to the matter, we would advise our readers to consult their histories.
