ble strength in the convention is susceptible of a very easy explanation. His main purpose for two years past has been to conciliate the Irish vote of the State and enlist it in his favor as a candidate for Governor, and by ways which only a first class demagogue like Butler knows so well how to adopt and utilize, he has at last succeeded in his purpose. It is safe to say that the Irish vote in the State constitutes. two-thirds of the strength of the Democratic party, and Butler has it almost solidly in his favor. In addition to this, he was backed up by the powerful support and influence of the Boston Pilot, the recognized organ of the Irish population. The members of the Democratic State Committee, with a single exception, were hostile to Butler's nomination, and were determined to prevent it at all hazards. Some of his most active friends, who were aware of this, taking time by the forelock, succeeded as early as fine o'clock in the morning in the convention was to meet, admitted the State Committee subsequently appeared in Stanton of Luzerne, entitled "An act fixing a Thompson H. New Orleans, went to look for his strong box the other day, that he might take from it enough of money to bury his dead child, he found that he had been robbed. The police traced the strong box to a negress of the neighborhood, and the victim had a pen in his hand, preparing to sign an affidavit against her, when it was suddenly announced in his hearing that his wife had taken the fever. Dropping the pen he rushed to his home, nursed his wife until she died and then died of the fever himself. Thus the negress escaped the penitentiary and holds the strong box.
