LOST ON THE MOORS.

MARY E. MOFFAT.

A wide stretch of breezy moorland, covered with purple heather, a sky whose radiant sunset tints were fast fading into neutral grays. Far in the distance some slowly rising smoke spirals told of warmth and shelter. It was a grateful sight to the eyes of a young man who had lost his way among the seemingly interminable solitudes, broken only by the sound of a frightened partridge.

Shouldering his game-bag he at once turned his steps toward the dusky barbin-ger of home comfort. As he reached the modest cottage he paused almost unconsciously, and looked in upon the family group just gathered around the table for their evening meal .the half open door. It was answered by a young girl. Doffing his cap the stranger said : "I am alone, and have lost my way among the moors. Can you give me the wherewithal to break my fast, and after that a directing hint homeward?"

"Come in, sir," said the farmer, who had followed Marian to the door. "You are welcome to aught we have. Eat and driuk first, then it will be time enough to think of leaving. Haste, Marian, and set a chair for the youth, and bring hot porridge." As Marian obeyed, Louis De Mornay's eyes followed her with a look of wonder lurking in their dark but brilliant depths. How had such a pure white lily blossomed from such a rugged stem, with a skin so satiny soft that the blue veins upon the temples could be traced beneath it, and eyes so large and clear in their unclouded blue that one could easily imagine them tinted from the sky itself as they looked out from waving masses of sun-bright hair. fastened only by the modest snood of bine ribbon. Louis De Mornay was a young Cuban who had but lately fallen heir to large estates, both in England and upon the continent. One of these was a fine hunting seat in Scotland, in which he was spendi the autumn months; and being of romantic temperament it was a great pleasure to him to sally out without his gamekeeper and to make his way over the country alone. This was the first time he had become bewildered as to location, and with the eathusiasm of his tropical Southern nature he added a silent but earnest thanksgiving to the old cottager's blessing over the food of which they were about to partake; for it was to him like the hand of cannot always ken why." fate that he had been led to the home which enshrined such a maiden. Never, in his wanderings over land and sea, had his eyes rested on one so beautiful, and like some blossom which remains folded in its calyx for years, and then burstslat once into gorgeous, love-compeling beauty, so did his heart open to receive into it maid Marian's image.

She could not but feel the influence of his magnetic glances; and a color stole softly up into her cheeks, and the blue eves scarcely dared lift themselves from out the ambush of the fringed lids as she listened to his conversation with her fath er. Why did her beart flutter so with pleasure when he accepted an invitation to remain until the morrow? She was glad to seek the solitude of her room to question and chide berself. What had this fieryeyed stranger to do with her simple cotage life? Yet the memory of those burnng glances would come back and thrill her very soul with their sweetness. All unwitting of the true attraction, farmer McGregor responded to the young man's expressed desire to try his hand at the birds upon the surrounding moors for a few days by a cordial invitation to him to remain as bis guest.

In his sturdy pride it never entered his mind that that child of his would think of lifting her eyes to that dark stranger, who, though to his knowledge a man of rank and consequence, was not at all to his taste in looks, with such midnight-dark hair and eyes, and a complexion like a Spaniard, though he well-liked to talk with him and listen to his stories of other lands and climes.

So it came upon hlm like a shock, when, after the stranger's stay had lengthened into weeks, he sought him one morning and told him the real attraction. It was his pearl-his white lily-it was Marian. The old man's lips opened at first for a burst of anger, but he was his guest. He had eaten of his salt. So he, with an effort, controlled himself and answered quietly, but with a firmness which augured

ill for the young lover's sait. "My daughter must marry in her own station when the time comes. She's ower young yet to make her choice. The blue eyes looked unnaturally bright | THE COURSE OF TRUE LOVE.

It is not often that the 'silly sooth' of a love tale is of importance so momentous as to deserve embalming in the grave editorial columns of a newspaper that has grown to manhood's proportion, and shows you the beard underneath the muffler, but-lis ten to this one. In 1841 a Prussian country squire, young enough to have his romance, but old enough to have shaken his health in burschen boots at Gottingen and Berlin, and wild bunting frolics in Pome ranian forests, came to the obscure peas ants' watering place called Mitterbad, in the valley of Unten, in Tyrol, to bathe and regain his tone and elasticity of frame. Mitterbad was the humblest of peasant bot springs, and in the Tyrol they know how to preserve the primitive simplicity of these places, for they take a noble pride in eschewing luxuries and keeping expenses down, so that every man, no matter how poor, may be able to go to the springs and take the baths if he needs them. Mitterbad, however, if it had no fashion, could still boast of beauty, and Josepha Holtz-ner, the daughter of the owner of the baths, though she had not yet passed out of her teens, was a belle of some seasons, nee of mind the brave little fellow wrappe. and had suitors from all the country side around. She was a girl of some torce of an women, when truly lovely, such a wonderful fascination. The Prussian squire, a man of austere demeanor and overbearingly haughty manner, saw Josepha, admired, worshipped, and began his wooing with impetuosity that in a short time he had frightened off all his rivals and conmain.
