Mrs. Ensley however proved equal to the demands of the occasion. With one hand she struck the horse a quick blow with the whip, and with the other drew a pistol from her pocket and without a moment's hesitation fired. The bullet whistled harmlessly through the air, but the tramp imagined that the pistol had been loaded with seventeen hundred slngs articles necessary for going to housekeeping and that each one had hit him. He took time to utter one yell of mortal terror before putting himself on the safe side of the neighboring hill, and Mrs. Easley proceeded on undivided patronage. The reason of this is her journey without further interruption.

A STRANGE STORY .- I had been reading yesterday, says a Preston county, W. Va., correspondent of the Bedford Gazette, the singularly remarkable case of Miss Fancher, of Brooklyn, as copied into the Gazette from the N. Y. Sun, to an old gentleman well known in this county and highly esteemed as an intelligent and truthful man, when he related to me the following strange incident of his own life :

"In the spring of f1543" said he, "I was living So loud and so strong that it most broke the tith my wife, whom I had recently married, bell, about two miles from where we are now sifting, in a small log bouse, and, as was common in those days, the fastening to the only door was a wooden latch. Some two-and a half miles south of us lived a married brother of my wife, and between the brother and sister a more than ordinary affection existed. One morning about three o'clock, I was suddenly roused out of a sound sleep by a noise as if some one had forced open the door by inrusting against it with the open paims of their hands. The moon was shining brightly, and as I looked towards the door, which was now wide open, I saw my wife's brocher, of whom I have made mention, come hurriedly from thence to the bed where my wife and I were lying. He came so close to ciously ought to pay a visit to Mr. Wolff's
