Dissolution of a Remarkable Copartnership in Wisconsin.

In the town of Westport, six miles north of Madison, Wis., have lived for many years two brothers named Dominick and Martin O'Malley. These brothers, when young men, in 1852, in opes were associated in her mind with the mountains of California, while minners in all their business enterprises. That partnership existed until yesterday. citement, and Dominick remained in "What is it, John ?" inquired his anx- California. Each kept an account, and the firm, with all the vicissitudes and varying luck of the miner's life, kept "Such news as I never hoped for or even solvent. Martin returned from Australia to Wisconsin, and began farming operations, and a year or two after Dominick returned. Every dollar of earnings or profits received by either of

> After their return to Wisconsin Martin married. The firm kept right on; the lands were all owned together; the house, as a homestead for family use, was built; every shingle used and every nail driven at firm expense, and household supplies procured also on firm account. Dominick soon after lost an arm. He went to France at firm expense to procure an artificial arm. He visited Ireland, and came back bringing a wife, imported at the expense of the firm. Then another house was built on the firm's lands and supplied out of the common fund with all housekeeping requisites. Since then their lands have beeu tilled; they have dealt in lands, and at present own extensive tracts in Kansas, besides some 700 or 800 acres in Westport. Such securities as they ownedthe surplus earnings of many years of single difference or discord on the part

They were both in feeling disinclined heads, and their children to approach mature age, they felt it a duty to dissolve this complex relation. Their method of doing this was as novel as their previous dealings had been. They went to their counsel and entered into a carefully prepared written agreement, arranging for divison and dissolution, to carry out which, at whatever cost of personal disappointment, they bound themselves by the most solemn covenants. Their respective houses were unlike in value and desirability. In dividing these and assigning to each his part they sold the right of choice to the highest bidder of the two. It was agreed that, should a change of houses be caused by their division, the entire household effects used by each should be left in the house he moved from, and that only the clothing of the family, the family Bible and pictures should be taken to the new home. The right of choice was awarded to Dominick, and he chose the house of Martin, who generously yielded it, as Dominick's family was the larger, and needed the larger house. So they are to change households, each taking his wife, children and their clothing, Bible and pictures, leaving everything else, and proceed to the home of the other and own and occupy it henceforth. It cost their wives a sigh of regret, but they cheerfully entered into this arrangement, and it was carried out with perfect confidence and good feeling. They have effected a division of all their lands except the Kansas lands, and for the first time since they were householders, they may be said to own a spoon or knife, fork, plate or tin dipper which is not partner-

These brothers are highly respected They have often held offices of trust in their towns. Dominick was a member of the Assembly in the year 1861.
