paratively good strength and spirits after my A LEAF FROM THE BOOK OF LAFF

Come with me, gentle reader, to one of nahere. The scene that first presents itself is forest trees, that have for ages with stood the blasts of tempests, now wave their foliage as leaves. Behind them, and peeping out occasionally as the thick branches are parted by the bands of nature, in one of the levell est cottages the eve ever rests on. Let us view of it; the house is built in true Guinle style, but with much more simplicity than is common at the present day. A neat lattleswork, over which climbs a beautiful honeysuckle, now in full bloom, is raised over the door, white around are scattered pinks and roses in rich protudos, till one might well suppose it the abode of "Cupid." Scated by the open window is a fair being of eighteen summers; her head is resting on her snowy hand, and she is lost in deep and evidently painful thought. To a form of perfect symmetry is added a face of faultless beauty, yet bearing traces of deep sorrow, for she is scarcely less pale than the white mantle that is careletsly thrown over her marble shoulders; her bair falls in nightdark ringlets, now gently stirred by the evening breeze; she is, indeed, most lovely .-

Oh! why so sad? Judge Ashiey, ber father, was an austere man, and though he loved his daughter to excess he at the same time exacted the most perfect obedience to all his wishes. One year previous to the date of my sketch a fair being had crossed the path of Mina Ashiey .-Everard Raymond was a fair specimen of the true gentleman. To a form and race of exquisite beauty he added that nobility of soul and grace of action that ever commands respect; but, unfortunately, he did not possess what the world calls wealth; this, in the estimation of the judge, was enough to render him an unfit salter for his daughter. The day on which our story commences Everard had asked of the father his daughter In marriage. I scarce need add that he was both refused and banished from the house; same says: Yesterday afternoon, when the avarice yield to wisdom?
