A CHESAPEARE MIRAGE -A correspondmile southward along the shore bordering on the bay, a gorgeous scene, resulting from peculiar conditions of the atmosphere, that would rival in its wonderful beauty the deceitful mirage of Africa's arid deserts. The lighthouse at the Cape, which is barely discernible ordinarily with the maked eye from the spot we occupied, being thirteen miles off, now seemed a gigantic tower, alternating with a thousand variegated hues, until its pinnacle, which had the appearance of an nmense spear head, was partly hid from view by the media which surrounded it like an immense veil of frosted notwork.

"The adjacent sand hills were even more beautiful, being metamorphosed into mountains, the unenlifeence and grandeur of which I feel unable to recall, dotted here and there with hills of gold, emerald and saphphire beneath the oblique rays of the sun, till their rolling summits passed beyond the pale of optical vision, and I found, on awakening from the reverie into which I had fallen, that all had passed away, and noticing remained but a dark line along the surface of the water to mark the distant shore."

THERE is a case in Berlin, Germany, of a musical baby. He is a pretty two year old boy, but can neither walk nor talk, though possessed of remarkable musical talent. He sings with great exactness all the melodies he hears, and curiously enough, minkes a slight company his exercises, and now, whenever he wishes to sing, he seats himself by his coffee mill and grinds it in exact time with his tune, to the great amosement of his fauily and friends who are allowed to hear him.
