JACOB SHARP died in New York a week ago last night. His death was the result of a complication of heart disease, bronchitis, and worry over the legal troubles in which he has so long been involved. Out of respect for the ancient and charitable maxim, "say nothing of the dead except that which is good," any comment now upon his alleged corrupt dealings with the City Board of Aldermen in 1884 which pre- cipitated his downfall, would be out of place. He appointed them be- cause they were useful and bonorable and patriotic citizens of the United States when he appointed them; and so the present ad- ministration appoints people who were in the rebellion in the same way, not because they were in that, not because they have a right to be rewarded for it now, either by administrative action or legislative authori- ty, but because there is oblivion on that, and without regard to their previous history in that respect they are common and equal citizens, with equal rights with anybody else. On reach- ing the old Primrose place some of the small- er children, who were in advance, gathered around a well and attempted to pump some water to drink. The planks on which they stood gave way and fifteen of the children were precipitated into the well, containing five feet of water.
