HYMENS HIGH PRIEST. A Minister of Much Experience in Matrimony. He Has Been Busy Until Tender Young Lovers for a Quarter of a Century—Merely an Eccentric Domestic Transaction.

"I have married so many girls that the ceremony no longer causes me the slightest emotion," said the gentleman, suavely. There was nothing about his manner which indicated that he was merely married to many girls to an equal number of male bipeds. In fact, he was one of the most popular ministers in Chicago.

A POET'S PUNCTUATION. How Shakespeare Made Dull Readers Catch His Own Inspiration. Shakespeare, as I have all but verified to my own satisfaction, at least, punctuated with the decision which we now look for—not vainly—in a Tennyson, a Ruskin or a Kingslake.

When I should have washed your hands before you grabbed this potato out of the dish-pan on the table. He threw up his hands with a shriek and sank down on a bench, all limp and broken up. Before he could recover himself he confessed, "He and Harriet had been together in her pocket, and he had made up his mind to get possession of her again, found where he was and sent him word that he must meet her late at night, when she would be alone, to discuss the situation. He went, but the sight of her and thoughts of Jane Blair, with whom he had parted in love in the meantime since parting with his wife, made him desperate."

"Now, I'll tell you my method, which as nearly as possible is always the same. Suppose I am sitting in my library reading 'Auriferum' and I am visited by those who, for reasons of their own, can not marry at home, or decline to do so on the ground of objecting to what they consider the old style, commonplace, milk-and-water nuptial celebrations. I have married all classes of people, from the children of the wealthiest parents to the offspring of the indigent. Well, sir, after two years' practice—I will call it practice, as there was something legal about it—I decided that the Adams and Eves were all alike on their wedding day; that I could adopt one method of treatment for the rich and poor; that I need only use one formula of small talk for the occasions. Thus I have saved myself a heap of trouble, and not get through each ceremony with the same nonchalant air that the surgeon shows in probing a trivial wound."

SPEED OF STEAMSHIPS. It is Attained by Driving Vessels More or Less Quickly. Just when the five-day mark may be reached by the transatlantic races can not be foreseen, and in view of the starting progress made very recently in high speed it would be a wild guess to predict what record will be made in any given future period. But we imagine that the limit will be set rather by the passengers than by the steamship companies, naval designers or engine-builders. If the passengers will continue to demand excessive speed and are willing to pay for the saving of a few hours' time, together with the attendant racing excitement and attendant risks, the ships will be forced to keep up the competition and to enter to that demand. The length of vessels, docking facilities, power of engines and all details will be forced to the greatest possible development, and the ships will be driven to their utmost. The legitimate gain in speed during late years has been due to increased size of vessels, twin screws and boilers capable of standing pressure not dreamed of a generation ago. The steamship companies, however, have not reached to an extreme and driving the ships more or less recklessly. Possibly there may be a reaction against the desire for great speed, or at least against speed attained only by taking unnecessary risks. If so, the steamship lines will devote attention rather to increased economy, safety, regularity of passage and comfort than to speed; and if this assumption should turn out to be correct, it is quite possible that the present record-makers and those now under contract have settled their rivalry no further increase in speed may be looked for during a considerable period, or even that a retrogression of records might set in for a time, even though we confess we have little expectation of seeing it.
