For some reason the arc lights in the mill went out, and Spickler, thinking the circuit had been broken, ascended a ladder to see if he could not fix one of the lamps. No sooner contact with the wires. The result was a shock that knocked him senseless and he fell to the ground twelve feet below. His fellow workmen witnessed the affair and fiastened to his assistance. They were horrified to find him apparently lifeless. There was not a motion of a limb or a visible tremor of a muscle. Thinking, however, that possibly life might not be extinct, they summoned Dr. W. B. Lowman and carried Spickler into the mill office. There the doctor examined him and found that he was still alive. Preper remedies were administered and, after about an hour's hard work he was fully restored to consciousness.
