Explanation of Weather Charts.

SIGNAL OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT, & WASHINGTON CITY. The Signal Officer has decided to distribute as widely as possible the daily weather charts, in order that the intelligent part of every community may utilize them by making special and local weather predictions and thus supplement the official forecasts, which, being for large areas of country must necessarily be brief and very general in their character. In order to supplement the knowledge of those who are unacquainted with the general accepted meteorological methods, a few words of explanation are considered advisable.

Storms are divided into two general classes, one in which a deficiency of pressure occurs, commonly known as "low" and another which appears in the form of an area of excessive pressure, and which is briefly knows as "high."

In order to show clearly the atmospheric pressure, the points having an equal pressure are connected by lines called isobars. which are drawn for every tenth of an inch. These isobars show that the atmospheric pressure over the earth along the line is equal to that which would be exercised by a layer of pure mercury of a thickness corresponding to the number of luches marked against the isobar.

Low areas travel across the Ubited States by diverse paths-the average direction being a little to the porth of east-with a velocity of about five hundred miles each twesty four bours. The winds blow contrary to the movement of the bands of a watch, spirally inward towards the area of lowest pressure, and their strength and violence are proportioned to the difference of pressure and temperature, which on these maps are indicated by the crowded condition of isobars and isotherms. The low area preceded by cloudy weather and rain, which sometimes extend many hundred miles in advance of the center. It is also preceded by temperature quite high for the season, except in very hot weather, when the temperature, although higher by night, is lower by day owing to cloudiness.
