His watch was found some distance away still running, but the chain was broken. When he became conscious tended over the road and right over the was broken. When he became conscious he could not conceive what had happened. On raising his head he observed his valuable horse lying dead close beside him, and he then realized that lightning had done its fatal work. He laid there alone for almost an hour in the greatest misery. Mr. Wisel, who lives a quarter of a mile away. hearing pitiful moans which he supposed came from some one in great agony, started out with his wife to find where the moans came from. It was then about half past six o'clock. They found him lying in the road with his head slanting down the hill, the water running around his body asked to be raised up and remarked that he would have to die before astistance, came, Mr. Wisel raised him tenderly in his arms and white and blue and white, large stylish broken plaids, and sent his wife down to the store for help.
