> With Bear and Snakes An adventure that rivals those of the good old Daniel of Scripture days and of Israel Putnam, the Revolutisnary hero, was experienced by William Sherer, of William sport. While prospecting for coal on the mountains of Clinton county, he took refuge in a cave under a cliff to escape death in a fierce forest fire. While there a black bear, also forced to shelter by the flames, tumbled into the hole upon Sherer. The beast was so badly frightened that it scrambled away as fast as it could go. Sherer killed four rattle snakes in the rock-bound den. The flames and smoke were so hot that his face and hands were blistered. He crawled on hands and knees to a creek a rod away where he obtained water enough in his hat to keep him from suffocation. Snakes were likewise driven to the stream by the flames, and Sherer saw nine rattlers during his brief journey from the cave to the stream. The fire was in "cuttings" and burned so fiercely that the tops of trees standing 50 feet high were ignited and became pillars of flame.
