decision long since irrevocable, but once more I place the choice in your hands. "You say you ask of me only myself. Is it not all I have to give? I cannot give it to you to lead the life of a recluse...

"I shall be so glad, Marion, when all this is over, when society will be so kind to let us drop from the roll, and retire into our own quiet home life."

"I was at that time that Allen Fane had been friends with children. He had carried with him all these years the picture of his first love, and when he returned to find his radiant beauty all dimmed, the first gladness was met with an absolute shock of feeling...

"I suppose it would be hard enough to give you up, Marion, to anyone," he said to her one evening when her lover was absent. "Notwithstanding my own love is hopeless, I cannot make a secret of it to the world, and I will not let you go so long as I looked upon him as my promised husband."

"I am not worthy, Nelson. Save yourself, and when you think of me, remember that my life will be yours for the moment, that I have met its just reward, for I loved you through it all."

Finishing. Advice is one of the unpleasant smaller evils that the truly good forget to condemn. Don't persist in error—after you're found out, and don't be found out if you can avoid it by persisting in it.
