progress in conducting the operations of the farm and garden; and, with judiclous management, crops may be increased, from year to year, until every acre and fruit tree will yield an annual crop equal to the nature of the climate and the capacity of the soil.

The first thing is to know what to do, and the second is the most effectual and feasible manner of performing the operation. Science assures us that a judiclous "rotation system" of operations, both on the farm and in the garden, is better for the soil and more satisfactory better for the soil and more satisfactory for the pocket of the proprietor. And the rotation system extends to the aptility system extends to the aptility system to the land to the system of the sys plication of fertilizing matter to the land, as well as to the production of crops. A rotation in the application of manure is a subject that is seldom thought of; and it applies especially to such cultivators as depend on mineral and commer-

Lime, for example, is the very foundar loans from Bank and sundry persons, fash received per Philip Hann, Shorif, tion of successful agriculture in certain sections of the country. But, instead of applying this material every season, the result will be found more satisfactory to try something else. Wood ashes have been applied to some land with results so satisfactory that the bountiful rops were really surprising to every beholder. But after a few dressings with ashes, even a bountiful application failed to produce an increase in the crop. A dressing of bone dust supplied what was lacking in the soil, so that the following crop was heavier than any previous harvest. If guano has been ema centered of applying gypaum every year, fore, of applying gypaum every year, give the land a dressing of ashes. If the soil has been dressed with straw manure for many years, let the value of a yearly dressing be invested in guano, bone dust, superphosphate, or someother commercial manure, and let this be applied instead of so much straw material.

Straw will not produce much fruit.— See 56 see 17 see 18 services and 18 serv Straw manure will give a heavy burden of vines and stalks. But in order to get a satisfactory crop of grain, or vegetables, some material must be applied that will supply the growing plants with the substance that every plant must have to develop the fruit in the form of grain or vegetables.

Here is where science comes to our state of the standard of the science comes to our science comes to f vines and stalks. But in order to get assistance. The man whose mind has been enlightened by the study of the soil, who has made himself familiar with the requirements of growing plants, will be able to determine, with almost uner-ring certainty, what is lacking in order to produce a satisfactory crop of cereal grain, grass, fruit or vegetables.

Let a practical example suffice: Last seasoff when we were on the experimental farm of the Government, at Washington, the Assistant Clerk showed us the growing crops. The wheat appeared large enough to yield fifty bushels of grain per acre. But the heads of grain vere unusually light, and the kernels small, simply because the land had not been fertilized with wheat producing material. He also showed the heaviest burden of squash vines that we ever saw. Indeed they formed a complete mat. But on the entire plot there was not as much fruit as a South Jersey gardener gathers from two hills. There was a deficiency of nitrogenous material such as we find, in the accumulations of cattle stalls and sheep sheds where the animals have been fattened with corn meal and oil cake. In the manure of animals fattened on such feed there is an abundance of just such pabulum as the growing plants must have to make them produce bountiful crops, while in the acvery little grain, where sheep are half starved on poor hay and mouldy corn stalks, and where cows get nothing but damaged hay, cabbage leaves and a pailof buckwheat bran in it, there will be fertilizing matter in the manure to make a heavy burden of straw and vines, and only a small yield of fruit.
