

Woman's Love.
Come from your long, long love,
On the sea will sail and love,
Come to me tender and loving,
And I shall be blest and true.

Of men though you are unloving,
Though proud be unable to share,
I'll pray till I weary all heaven,
If only you come back here.

Where your sails have been maturing,
What winds have blown on your bow,
I know not, and ask you no more,
So that you come to me now.

Sorrowful, ailed, and lonely,
Poor and deeply thought you be,
All are nothing, if only you,
You turn from the tempter to me.

The Woodland Princess.
What if we met in an old log road,
Where the last-molded clung to her small
head,
And instead of woodland flowers, her head
Was a string of trout and silver fish?

Her gown was ranged and limp with dew,
But it seemed a veil of silver fish,
A rich red torrent was flashing through
Her startled pulses to cheeks and lips.

The whole of her body was
Was like ripe fruit in a bower of green,
And she walked the world with the easy grace
And firm, free step of a woodland queen.

The dew had moistened the jetty hair
That waved and floated about her head,
I caught a glimpse of her eyes,
The sparkling eyes and the lips of red.

Only a glimpse of the lustrous gleam,
As she dimmed from view the leafy way;
A glance of the shoulders, plump and brown,
And a leg as plump and brown as they.

And I wandered on by the weedy stream
To try for the trout that would not rise;
For I walked all day in a misty dream
Of lips and shoulders and curls and eyes.

And I thought of a damsel, city-bred,
Of narrow shoulders and a graceful gait,
With pale hair framed about her face,
And pale lips beamed by rule and line.

Unkissed and beardless in wily care,
Expensive, vapour, worthless, when,
The mother had laid the child she bears,
Where shall we go for the nation's weal?

I take the lot that the Fates decree,
And my happiness fall on me as one;
But the woodland maid, with her beauty free,
Is the dream I'll dream till my life's done.
