The preparations which for menths have been making for the exhibition at The preparations which for menths have been making for the exhibition at Vienna, says a letter, have nearly come to an end, although it will probably be. June before all things will be in perfect condition. All the articles to be exhibited have not yet arrived, and it is even said that between that city and the frontier there are so many vehicles waiting that with the utmost possible diligence it will take nearly a month for their unloading. Latterly between 12,000 and 14,000 workmen have been employed about the buildings, but there yet remains much for them to do. The Prater, in which the structures stand, is the great public park of Vienna, and it is only the upper part of this which has been set aside for the use of exhibitors. It lies to the northeast of the city, and about one-third of a mile down city, and about one-third of a mile down the main drive is the principal entrance to the Industrial Palace, which is nearly 3,000 feet long, and consists of a central dome and two wings. These latter volumes. This edition superseded all tral dome and two wings. These latter are divided into thirty-two half transepts, which are apportioned among the various nationalities taking part in the exhibition, while the dome itself is reserved as a sort of centre in which shall be reflected the brightness of all the world, with especial reference to no particular part of it. The roof of this centre rests upon thirty-two iron box columns eighty-two feet high, the span being 334 feet. Next to the dome, the machinery building is the largest of the structures, being 2,600 feet long and 160 feet broad.
