A Train Thrown From the Track and

In the City of Portland, Me., in the memorable martial year of 1861, a respectable merchant was moved to grave anxiety by his only daughter's infatuation with a masculine admirer, of whose antecedents and character it was very difficult for her or her family to gain any definite knowledge. She had been introduced to him in a mixed company, on some semi-public occasion, by an acquaintance knowing him only slightly and by name; his first subsequent call upon her at her home had been without formal invitation; and, indeed, his force.

Robbed by Armed Men.

The robbers, who were all but one masked, had removed the plates connecting one rail with those next to it, and putting a rope through the holes in one end, awaited the coming train. When the train was within two rods of the place, the rope was pulled, and the rail was thrown across the track. Simultaneously several shots were fired in quick succession. The engineer saw the displaced rail and reversed his engine and applied the air-brakes, which was his last act. Engine, tender, and two baggage-cars were thrown into and was; our friend started back and ut-Wells, Fargo & Co.'s, amount not known.
