THE DARING ROBBERY.

Mrs. Danser's Story of the Crime--- Hothe House in New York was Entered-The Lady Blindfolded, Gagged, and Handenfied---The Stolen Property Worth

Mr. Matthias Danser, whose residen t was that was ransacked and robbed in New York, in conversation with a Times reporter, spoke of his loss in a very philosophical way, although he betrayed great nervousness in his manner. Mr. Danser said that his wife had been unable to talk with any one except himself, as the physician had ordered that she should be kept as free from excitement as possible, in order that she might recover from the nervousness consequent on the rough treatment she had received. She is considerably bruised, her neck being black and blue from the effects of the choking administered by the bandits as a persuasive measure to induce her to tell them where to find the money and bonds of which they were in search. The story of her adventures, as told by her, was that at about half-past eleven in the morning, after her husband and daughter had gone out, leaving her alone, three young men of respectable appearance stopped in front of the door and critically examined the front of the house. One of them had a blank book in his hand, and seemed to be writing in in his hand, and seemed to be writing in it with a lead pencil. The other two ap-peared to be talking in an easy, uncon-strained manner, but did not talk much. They had the air of men who were on business, and when they rapped at the basement door, as they did shortly afterward, she supposed it was in relation to some matter of water rates or taxes of some kind. The business was not a pleasant one, and she hesitated about replying to their summons, as she was all alone in the house, and did not wish, on account of her age, to discuss business matters. A second knock, however, fol-lowed the first, after a short interval, and to this she responded, opening the door for the supposed officials. Their first words, "something about the water," confirmed her supposition, and, with no misgivings, she allowed them to enter, and as they stepped toward the back part of the hall she followed them unsuspectingly. Unobserved by her, one of the three lagged behind after she had closed the hall door, and locked and bolted it securely. As soon as this was done, the other two seized Mrs. Danser by the throat, choking her to prevent any outery, and holding her so tightly as to overcome any struggles the feeble old lady might make, they bore her up stairs. She was overcome with terror but had presence of mind enough to re frain from struggling, realizing her ut-ter helplessness, and knowing that the best thing she could do would be to remain passive. First seeking the rear part of the third story of the house, as being probably the furthest away from any of the neigh-bors who might chance to overhear them, they looked carefully at the windows to see that they were closed, and then be gan questioning their victim and threat-ening her with death if she did not tell them where to find money and bonds. They said over and over again that unless she told them where to find money and bonds they would cut her throat, but the only answer she could of the gang went down stairs and admitted some confederates, how many is not known, but Mrs. Danser believes that the entire gang numbered seven.
