Sketch of the Life of the Mur- Sketch of the Life of the New

By the summer of 1854 young Garfield, then twenty-three years old, had prosecuted his studies as far as the academirs of his native region ceal l carry thim. He resolved to go to college, calculating that he coel l complete the ordinary course of study in two years. From his school teaching and carpenter work he had saved about half enough to pay expenses. To obtain the rest of the money he procured a life insurance policy, which he assigned a gentle-man who loaned him what funds he needed, knowing that if he lived he would pay it, and if he died the policy would secure it. In the fall of 1854, young Garfield was atmitted to the junior class of Williams college, Massachu-setts. He at once took high rank as a student, and at the end of his two years course bore off the metaphysical honor of his class. On his return to bis Western home, Mr. Gar-field was made teacher of Latin and Greek in the Hram Ecirclic Institute. So high a posi-tion did he take, and so opoplar did he be-come, that in the next year, 1857, he was made president of the institute. His position at the head of a popular seminary, 'to-gether with his talla-is as a speakor, caused him to be called upon for frequent public ad-dresses, both from the platform and the public ad-dresses, both from the platform and the public.

He had taken an active interest<sup>5</sup> in politics at a very early age. He sympathized with the Whig party and was an ardent admirer of Henry Clay. His first vote was cast in 1852 - for Win-field Scott for President. In New York city Mr. Arthur identified himself with the "practi-cal men" in politics by joining political asso-ciations of his party and sitting at the polis and acting as inspector of election on election day. In the formation of the Republican party Mr. Arthur took a very prominent part. He was a delegate to the convention at Saratogs that foomded the Republican party. During those political labors he became acquainted with Edwin D, Morgan and gained his ardent friend-ship. Mr. Morgan, when re-elected governor in 1860, testified to his high esteem for Mr. Arthur by making him engineer-in-chief on his staff.
