The steer canal and Port Said were considered the advent of the Colorado beethe it has not been profitable to raise potatoes for feeding hogs. The labor of raising them has been too great, and their price has been higher than that of corn. There is, however, profit in raising arti-chokes, and their cultivation should be extended to every part of the country. Attention should also be given to rais-ing sugar beets, cartots, squashes, jumpkins and sweet corn, to be fed with the stalks. All these materials are chesply raised and pro-mote the growth of the animals, if they are not productive of much fat. Most of them are also desirable articles to feed in connection with corn and small grains, as they furnish variety, keep up an appetite, and improve the general condition of the animals. Many farmers seem to have forgotten that the hog is by nsture a grazing an-imal. With a sui able pasture hogs plants about as many months in a year s cattle can. all. An acre in red clover or orchard grass will support five medium-sized hogs during the time it furnishes good feed. A hog pasture should be well supplied with water and shade, and should contain some ground that is sufficiently high to be permanently dry even if the lower ground is quite moist. To provide against drought it is best to sweet corn or some other forage crop on land adjacent to the pasture. In case it is required it can be cut up and thrown over the fence. Recently some have favored keeping hogs in a large lot and raising all the green food for them on the out-side.
