In Friesenheim, on the Rhine, the can and dare, he is perplexed by one of two problems only: How to retrieve his losses, or how to spend his winnings. The prevalence of his view is not at all surprising. This class of statesmen despise the people whom they would cajote, and rely for their success even more upon the apathy of the pure and intelligent than upon the activity of the selfish and unscrupulous. The second view regards the recent overturn as a mere caprice of mobile voters, a public spasm, a sentimental convalsion. It is based, wittingly or unwittingly, upon a latent distrust of the peo-ple; it imports a low view of American machood, and a secret, but ill-disguised, STARTLING DEATH-BED CONFESdisbelief in our capacity for self-government. If it be, indeed, well grounded, then there is little hope for the perpetuity of our institutions, and for that magnificent industrial and po ideal development which is the staple of our noblest day dreams. But the third view is more hopeful and patriotic. According to it, this change marks the beginning of a new epoch in our political life. Those who cherish it argue that thousands of our best citizens, relieved of the pressure of national anx ieties, and unwilling to I ve forever in the past, are beginning to sindy the na ture and details of state and municipal government as never before; are awaken ing to the business and scientific character of political problems, and have determined to throst aside every individual, and every contrivance that stands between them and the man gement of their own affairs. They will no longer be content with antomatic activity in policies; they demand a conscious share in this noblest pursuit of intelligent men. His Suggestions to the Legislature

Harrisburg, January 2.—Gov. Hoyt's message is an elaborate and carefully prepared document. It reviews the State finances as follows:

Four years ago our people had not emerged from the effects of the long and disastrous prostration of business; and their ability to respond to the demands of the treasury to meet expenses was seriously impaired. The financial officers of the State, at the time, found large failures in the sources of revenue conforms.
