CHEWING LIVE COALS.

A brazier of burning charcoal was brought in, and the charcoal fanned into a blaze. The sheik then went through ar evocation, and suddenly with his bare feet jumped upon it and stood there for nearly a minute, the lurid flame curling round them. The moment he got off the serpent eaters rushed forward and filled their mouths with the red-hot charcoal, which was again fanned, the smell of burning flesh becoming powerful and sickening as they crunched the glowing morsels. Live coals are possibly the antidote to snakes after you have eaten them, but the general effect of all this strange diet was beginning to have a powerful influence upon the nerves of some of the lady spectators, who protested that they were unable to witness further horrors. A man now stepped forward, stripped to the waist, with a skin almost as fair as a European's. His face had none of that expression of fanatical insanity which characterized some of his fraternity, but was calm and somewhat commonplace. The sheik reappeared armed with a skewer of large dimensions than he had thrust through the cheeks of the first victims, to the end of which was attached a heavy iron ball, and proposed to run it through the man's throat from the front, bringing it out at the nape of his neck. At this there was a general scream of horror and dismay. It vain did the sheik protest that the operation would be absolutely painless, and show us the indurated spots on the opposite side of the man's neck through which the instrument was in the habit of passing while the man himself smiled with a bland expression of disappointment at being deprived of a pleasure to which he was apparently looking forward. The repugnance of some of our party was not to be overcome, and the sheik turned with an expression of contempt to make preparations for what was to follow. Pushing the same dervish's waist-cloth down an inch or two, he revealed a row of cicatrices which made a semicircle extending round his body. He then drew a curved knife, about eight inches long and nearly two broad, from a sheath, and proposed to plunge it to the hilt in his stomach. It had a short wooden handle about four inches in length, and there was no possibility of the blade slipping back into the handle. But here again he was stopped by a cry of horror from the ladies. This time the man earnestly joined his protestations to those of the sheik; his credit seemed at stake, as there were women on the house-tops who began to chatter, and a general look of dissatisfaction on the part of the spectators in the court-yard. I examined both the scars and the knife. The former were thin, beautifully-healed incisions; the latter as sharp as a razor and of the finest steel. I am very sorry that veracity compels me to leave this most interesting experiment to the reader's imagination. The party had now made up their minds to leave the place, and seemed to have no other idea than a hurried escape from its precincts, so we made rather an ignominious exit, leaving the sheik bewildered and somewhat indignant at our pusillanimous conduct.—Blackwood's Magazine.

A BEDOUIN HORSEMAN.

While climbing slowly up a steep bank of the opposite side, a Bedouin of the tribe of Ben Isscher, mounted on a pretty black mare, overtook us at full gallop. He pulled up and joined our party, and we talked to him for some time through Karam. Albert offered to buy his long spear with silver-bound joints. At one end was an iron point to stick into the ground when not in use, and at the other a short point of burnished steel. He was a most friendly and affable Bedouin, and showed us all his arms—pistol, sword, knife, and so forth. When we arrived at the rocky plateau at the top of the hill, he gave a sort of performance for our amusement, galloping about and whirling his lance with dramatic effect and many loud cries, as he thrust at and parried thrusts from an imaginary enemy. He turned and twisted his mare about with incredible ease and swiftness, only guiding her with a halter, for the bit, which is scarcely ever used except in warfare, hung idly from his saddle all the time. We rode together for some distance, and at parting, he took the charm from the horse's neck—a crescent-shaped piece of wood—and presented it to me with a graceful salaam. All together we were rather pleased with our fellow-traveler, until old Hadji Hassan let out that his parting words had been strongly expressed wish to find any two of us alone in a place where he could use his weapons in earnest. Six together were beyond his ideas, so he made the best of his disappointment.—Mrs. Brassy, in Fraser's Magazine.

A conceited young country Parson, walking home from church with one of the ladies of his congregation, said, in allusion to his rustic audience: "I preached this morning to a congregation of asses." "I thought of that," observed the lady, "when you called them beloved brethren."

MANHOOD
How Lost, How Restored.
Just published, a new edition of Dr. Culverwell's Celebrated Essay on the radical cure of Spermatism, or Seminal Weakness, involutionary Hematuria, Impotency, Mental and Physical Instability, Impediments to Marriage, etc., also Consumption, Epilepsy and Fits, induced by self-indulgence, or sexual extravagance, etc.
The celebrated author, in this admirable essay clearly demonstrates from his successful practice that the awful consequences of self-abuse may be effectually cured; pointing out a mode of cure at once simple, certain and effectual, by means of which every sufferer, however long his malady may be, may cure himself cheaply, privately and radically. This lecture should be in the hands of every youth and man in the land.
