HUMAN BONDAGE IN AIRZONA. Washington. Mar 10.—D. M. Riordan of the Navejo Indian Agency writes from Fort Defiance, Arizona, that a boy recently killed by a member of Francisco Capitain's band was a slave of the murder. The owners of slaves have always held that they have absolute power over them, and they think as little of killing one of them as of killing a dog. They beat and starve them and act toward them as stave drivers generally do. The agent adds: 'The Indian seemed unable to comprehend why I took so much interest in a dead slave. I learned from Francisco Capitain that the entire from Francisco Capitain that the entire tamily of the murdered boy and five other persons were held as slaves. The original persons were held as slaves. The original slaves were two Moqui girls who were bought for corn four generations ago. All their descendants were considered slaves and so treated. Some time ago the father of the murdered boy asserted his right to be free. The killing of the boy was thought to be the proper way to remind the father of his dependent condition. I determined to secure the liberation of all the remaining slaves and demanded that all those to secure the liberation of all the remaining slaves and demanded that all those downwards and the secure that all those downwards are held in bondage should be set free. They said it would completely ruin them. One old villain wanted to know who would take care of him if his slaves were taken away. Agent Riordan says he insisted, that all the slaves should be freed and the Indians finally acceded to his demand. Her estimates that there are about 300 persons held inslavery by this tribe. Some of them are war captives, and others were procured by war captives, and others were procured by trade or purcase. Their descendants, he says, are always considered slaves. The Indian Bureau has approved the action of Agent Riordan, and will render him every assistance possible in carrying out his

The construction of a machine which would exhibit accurately the moticens, distances, and magnitudes of the planets, and could be kept in running order for three hundred years, is an impossibility. Such a piece of mechanism would require the skill of the Great Architects of worlds. The history of the Strassburg clock and the planetarium connected with it bears witness, like everything else, to the imperfection of workmanship, and the frequent accessity of changes and repairs.

The clock stands in the cathedral, and dates back to 1352, when it was put up under the patronage of Berthold de Buchek, at that time Bishop of Strassburg. As time passed on, the clock got out of order, and in 1647 three distinguished mathematicians were commissioned to put it in repair. They all died before the work was finishe dand Conard Dasypodius undertook the responsible task, which he completed in four years. The clock worked well until 1.783, the year of the Great Revolution, when it struck for the last time.

It was left undisturbed for near y fifty years, and fell into a dilapidated condition mournful to behold. An effort was then made for its restoration. This was a found to be impossible, fer the works we re rendered almost useless by rast and verdigris. Finally, Schwilgue, and a trat an mathematician of Strassburg. Indectook to repair, modify, and reins at the clock. He commenced the task in 1836, and, after working four years, complete 1 it in 1840.
