RICH foods, such as grain, oil meal, etc., can be fed with greater profit to cows when butter is the object than when cheese or milk for sale is the end desired. The quantity of oil in milk can be greatly increased by rich food, but the casein varies little. Watery foods, such as roots, green forage and brewers' grains, are credited with pro- liable. ducing a large flow of milk, poor in fats, but containing the usual amount of casein. Hence in the cheese dairy such foods are desirable and more profitable than grain for feeding. But the butter maker will find it profitable to feed largely of the richer foods.
