FEAR TREES IN SOD, -For the past ten years we have had a part of an orchard of the Lawrence pear seeded to grass, and the other part cultivate? and planted with corn, potatoes, fodder or parsnips. Both have been regular ly manured, the cultivated portion the heaviest. The cultivated trees were nearly double the size of others. After gathering, the difference in the appearance of the pears from the two portions was very distinct; those from the cultivated ground being large, smooth and smaller and not so uniformly fair. On counting the number of specimens in a bushel of each, the smaller pears were found to contain just double the number of the larger ones, 135 specimens of the latter and 270 of the former filling a bushel measure. The latter were, of course, better in flavor and cultivated trees and their products, had one drawback some years ago when
