The patient gazes steadily on the object. The eyes are thus subjected to a strain. In a few minutes they begin to wink, then more and more rapidly, then the lids droop and finally fall, as in sleep. The patient becomes quite unconscious, as in a sound sleep. Charcot calls this the state of lethargy. Pull open his eyelids with the fingers, they will remain open and staring. The subject is now in what Charcot calls the second state, that of catalepsy. In this state, if his fists be clinched, they will remain in that condition, and his face will assume an expression of the most violent anger. If his arm be raised in the air, it will remain thus rigid till brought down by the operator. His muscles remain fixed where they are placed.

The patient is now ready for the third stage, that of somnambulism. By rubbing the cataleptic person briskly upon the top of his head. Charcot says he makes him pass into somnambulism.
