KILLING BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION.

Once more a bankruptcy bill has failed in the House, says the Philadelphia Times. This should not have been. If the bill was defective or objectionable in any important detail the House was clearly right in refusing to pass it until all serious defects had been corrected. But, assuming that the founders of the Constitution knew what they were about in clothing Congress with the power to pass bankruptcy laws, it is hard to understand why Congress persistently refuses to pass any law upon the subject.

Since the repeal of the act passed during or near the close of the war bankruptcy acts have been introduced in nearly every session of Congress only to be smothered in committee, put upon the unfinished calendar or be defeated outright by a direct vote. Insolvent laws, if admissible at all, should be uniform in their action, and this uniformity can only be secured by an act of Congress. The insolvent laws of the several States are conflicting and inharmonious and must necessarily continue to be so. A notional bankruptcy law properly framed would serve the interests of debtor and creditor alike and the defects of the old bankruptcy law, which enabled unscrupulous individuals to get rich by failing and going through bankruptey, could certainly be avoided in a new act.

The experience acquired under the workings of the old law should enable ry suit of clothes cost $20.
