The other day while one of our men in town was attempting to fish up the end of a broken chain in his well, and standing on a ladder down at the edge of the water, he suddenly became overbalanced, lost his equilibrium, and fell head foremost into the water, but in his descent he managed to get his feet entangled with the rungs of the ladder, and thus saved himself from going to the bottom, and perhaps a watery grave. Wadsworth's poem, "The old oaken bucket which hung in the well" no doubt has lost all its charm for him since this encounter.

To that land of many mansions, Up high, in those realms of light, Our mother's glorified Spirit
Hath suddenly taken flight:
To the arms of her dear Savior,
Where her Soul will know no care;
In that land of life and glory
We shall surely meet her there.
Many the years she hath suffered,
Many the burdens she meekly bore.
Many the prayers to Heaven she offered,
Many the prayers to Heaven she offered,
Many Heavenly smiles those features wore.
But now in sight of the hosts of glory,
Her voice, newly borne, she'il raise
To Him who hath redeemed her,
To Jesus, she'il give eternal praise.
Had the chariot wheels of Father Time
Not moved so cruelly slow,
The suffering that so recently ended,
Might have closed years ago.
We who mourn her are truly grateful
That our mother's Soul doth rest,
Free from that old sin cursed body,
Free, in happiness; forever blest.
Six dear ones are left to mourn her
As she moulders into dust;
Six broken hearts still cling to her
Though admitting, the Lord is just.
Six wounded hearts will strive to meet her
On that shore she taught us of,
Oh! will six of those loving children
Meet their mother, with God above?
Now whilst enshrouded in our sadness,
Reflect on what God has done;
Let us not in ruthlessness forget
Some others, who share our gloom;
Weeping friends who in this hour of darkness
Have rendered us kindest aid.
Will receive our heartfelt gratitude,
And in Heaven be better paid.
We all must cast away these garments
Of flesh, for earthly they be,

And in Heaven be better paid.

We all must cast away these garments Of fiesh, for earthly they be, And God will clothe in bright array All who in His love agree.

Kind friends, weep not, rather rejoice In hope of what we may gain, By a walk close to our God, And a life free from sinful stain.
