was true to his record of an indiarubber backbone man. When, on June 21, a motion was made to postpone further consideration of the rapid transit question until September, Stuart seemed very glad to vote "aye." It was such a relief, you know. Three days later John Wanamaker, interested in the "Consolidated Elevated," seeing the futility of overcoming the obstructionists, diplomatically suggested, in a letter, that the bill be postponed for a little while, and that in the meantime a commission be appointed to devise, if it could, a better scheme than the one which Mr. Wanamaker and other eminent citizens had guaranteed to be offered in good faith. "We believe," Mr. Wanamaker wrote, "the city can never have a better opportunity to secure rapid transit under fair and just conditions." Yet the chief representative of the Pennsylvania railroad in select council, who has since died, moved for indefinite postponement of not only the bill, but also of the Wanamaker proposition for a commission, so as to kill the whole thing, and Stuart voted for that death of rapid transit.

The great wonder is that Stuart took a positive stand on that all-important question, in view of the fact that, from beginning to end of his service in councils, his record, with few exceptions, is one prolonged series of "present but not voting" on about two-score different important subjects of which he was evidently very much afraid. He dreaded, for instance, to take a hand in Chestnut street widenings, or upon any important bill affecting the down-town section in which he lives. There are innumerable cases of his being present but not voting upon measures relating to the down-town wards. Bills in which churches of different denominations were interested were particularly shunned by him. Confirmation of mayoralty or departmental appointments were to him as a plague of cholera. Any vote that he might cast might make somebody mad, you know.

As Wax In Hands of Bosses.

November 17, 1887, absent when underground conduit and electric light matters, as well as Bell Telephone company interests were before the chamber. The Third regiment armory being near Stuart's house, he did not vote, although present, upon the question of putting up a Siemens gas lamp in front of the armory. That little thing might have involved Stuart in a dispute as to the merits of a patent, and he was willing, in the vote, February 16, 1888, to let the lamp go or stay, as long as he was not recorded on it. March 20, 1888, present but not voting on the creation of a bureau of city property, a question to be eschewed by a candidate for the mayoralty in the days when such nominees were not selected for ability, courage or public spiritedness, but for their known willingness to be as wax in the hands of the plundering power that is now on its last legs.

June 21, when the appointments of Mayor Pittler, Director Stockley and the new administration generally were up for confirmation, Stuart absent. At the next meeting, when a lot more of such appointments came up, Stuart was present but not voting, although he voted on the next bill. Presently the "Northeastern Elevated" came along, and there was a renewal by Stuart of the peculiar non-committal policy with which he had treated similar former measures. Gratuitous vacation had a horror for him, or, at least, on November 22, he sat silent when the bill passed finally without opposition. While other members had the courage of their convictions on all such measures, Stuart maintained the show of timidity which has characterized him ever since.

A certain selectman, who has since died, and who would be about the last man in Philadelphia whom the people would expect to conduct a satisfactory investigation into legislative bribery, moved, on December 6, 1888, for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the charge of bribery in connection with the elevated railroad proceedings. On the little reform side there was a motion to excuse the mover of the resolution from the duty of acting as chairman. That was about as polite a way as it could be said that nobody would have any confidence in the probing under the management of the redoubtable ringster in question, who, however, won the chairmanship by a vote of 14 to 9, Stuart being among those voting to insist upon his taking that power, which, of course, the machine expert did. The subsequent "investigation," in the vernacular of the Betz building or the Boas mansion, was "a peach."

But this instance is inconsistent with the general run of the Stuart record in the journals, as it is one of the very few cases of his actually doing something, although, unfortunately, not very much to his credit. December 13, 1888, the ordinance up was something momentous, to permit construction of the East Side railroad along the Schuylkill river. Great fight in councils that day, but Stuart not there. Other measures before the chamber that day, including street railway track extension, Keystone light and power privileges and big appropriations, were additional reasons for the discreet absence of the man then expecting the mayoralty, and now the governorship. By the way, Mr. Stuart is a remarkably healthy man, and nobody would think of suggesting sickness as an excuse for either his absence or his countless cases of dodging.

Rarely Did He Commit Himself.

December 27, present but not voting on bill to let a certain brewer lay railroad sidings. Stuart voted just ahead of and just after this ticklish measure. February 21, 1889 (getting close to the time for setting up the pins for the mayoralty canvass), street railway extension before the chamber, together with frame building erection, but no vote from Stuart on these matters, although he was present. March 21, John M. Mack's Vulcanite Paving company's bill under consideration, with Stuart present but not voting. One of the things that used to raise trouble in Philadelphia was the voting of city land at reasonable prices to the University of Pennsylvania, but when such propositions came before select council, Stuart sat mum during the voting as well as the talking.

But this record must be cut off here for the present. It was an exceptional day when Stuart was caught committing himself on an issue that might prevent him from having an entirely colorless public record. Suffice it to say, until time for the next installment, that Stuart became more and more cautious, if that were possible, as the mayoralty primaries of the February campaign of 1891 approached. His dodging during the year 1890 was the most interesting of all, but there is a great deal yet to be said of the years which have been only hastily skimmed over in this sketching of the people's experience with Stuart from which they are to judge of what they might expect from him in the chair of the chief executive at ~~Manhattan~~.

DEEP PROBING NEXT WINTER

Honest Legislation Needed to Check Law-Defying Corporations.

If the people in November elect the right sort of a state legislature there will be no danger of such blocking of the probe as was done by the present state senate, when Democratic Senator Grim, of Bucks county, offered the following resolution in relation to the deal of the railroad corporations to wipe out enormous financial obligations in return for the slating and election of the successor to the "Old Man" in the United States senate:

Whereas, Serious charges affecting the honor of Pennsylvania in relation to the selection and appointment of a United States senator to represent this state in the senate of the United States has been publicly made and published in the Pittsburg Times of January 10, 1905, and later by various other responsible newspapers published in Pennsylvania, wherein the details of the transactions by which the selection was to be made in payment of certain financial obligations, then outstanding, were set forth circumstantially and with precision; and Whereas, The said newspapers have made no public retraction of the said charges, but some of the persons therein publicly named have denied the allegations, and the people of this commonwealth are not informed as to whether the charges alleged are true or false; and

Whereas, The said charges, if true, not only affect the honor and dignity of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, but the title of the Hon. Philander C. Knox to his seat in the senate as well, if it should be ascertained that he was in any manner cognizant of the transactions detailed, and if false, that he should be accorded the privilege of having all suspicion removed and the honor and dignity of the commonwealth vindicated and the said newspapers be publicly branded as maligners; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the president of the senate, immediately upon the passage of this resolution, appoint a committee of three senators, whose duty it shall be to thoroughly investigate the truth or falsity of the said charges, with full power to employ counsel, to issue subpoenas, and require the attendance before them for examination of all persons and for the production of all papers, books, notes and agreements that may be necessary, and to take the testimony in the matter and report the result of their findings, together with all the testimony taken, to the senate on or before the first day of March next.

Of course, this was promptly voted down by the McNichol-Penrose-Durham majority in the senate. But things will be different in Harrisburg next winter.
