PRESIDENT AND MR. CAR-NEGIE AT ODDS.

"I believe in peace and arbitration, and I also believe in keeping in such trim that it shall be a temptation to nobody to wrong us.

'If we build up the American fleet as we ought to build it up, the other party will not really desire war."-President Roosevelt.

"The simple agreement between Great Britain and the United States that upon the inland seas in the north only two tiny vessels, each with one 18-pounder gun, should patrol those waters, the one flying the Union Jack and the other the Stars and Stripes, the only shots ever being fired being salutes expressive of amity and friendship, makes these vessels the most powerful vessels of war, the true Dreadnoughts, since there is nought to dread from them. A nation has everything to dread from gigantic armed Dreadnoughts, nothing to dread from these true agents of peace.

"When President Roosevelt is as old as I am he will take a more roseate view of coming peace. I will make a friendly compromise with him and agree that world peace may be some distance away. But among ourselves, the nations of the Western World, I believe that permanent peace is near; and we have a territory in the nations represented in this union four times as great as that of Europe. -Andrew Carnegie.

Circled In Midair, The machine circled in midair with the buoyancy of a kite, responding perfectly to each turn of the levers that guide the 950-pound aeroplane over the heads of the small, scattered party of unwelcome spectators, some of whom leveled cameras and field glasses at it, the airship sailed for miles above the well nigh desolate country in the vicinity of Kill Devil Hill Life Saving Station, where o narrow sand spit separates the waters of the Atlantic and Albemarke

Their experiments proved but a repetition of the achievements of the day before when the dauntless aeronauts accomplished four successful flights, two of them, made after sunset, covering three and a half to four miles each, scoring a four mile clip down the coast in two minutes and fifty seconds at an altitude of 40 feet, the two aeronauts alighting each time at the place of starting. The flights were satisfactory to the inventors, and both morning and afternoon were utilized in the work. The inventors were astir early, and had their airship ready and in operation at an hour when it was impos sible for the visitors to reach the immediate neighborhood of Kill Devil Hill from Manteo, the nearest place where the strangers can be domiciled, a good dozen miles across the sound. Everything favored the tests. The weather conditions were good. the atmosphere conditions seemed to be in accord with the best hopes of the aerial navigators and the wind was but a 12-mile-an-hour blow from the southwest. The "heavier than air" machine glided gracefully upward, responded easily to the touch of the levers and traversed four miles, finally landing within a mile of the starting point.
