

The Reporter never took much stock in boosting a man for office just because he is poor and needs it, but financial standing should after all be considered when making a choice. J. Frank Smith, the Democratic candithe farm, in the woods and in the county. store. He began life without a dollar, reared a family, and was unfortunate to be obliged to meet large doctor bills almost every year during his married life, and during the past two years a physician was a regular caller at his home almost every day. If there is such a thing as being deserving of consideration on the part of voters on account of need of the fees of the office, Mr. Smith comes under that head. True, if defeated, he will provide for his motheriess children, and make every effort to educate them as best he can, but the small receipts of the office to which he is aspiring will be a godsend to the entire family.

When the curtain of the election booth drops at your back, take up the case of J. Frank Smith and consider it.
