

SECRET SERVICE BEING THE HAPPENINGS OF A NIGHT IN RICHMOND IN THE SPRING OF 1865 THE PLAY BY WILLIAM GILLETTE; BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY ILLUSTRATIONS BY EDGAR BERT SMITH COPYRIGHT 1912 BY DODD, MEAD AND COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

Mrs. Varney, wife of a Confederate general, has lost one son and another is dying from wounds. She reluctantly gives her consent for Wilfred, the youngest, to join the army if his father consents. The federals are making their last assault in an effort to capture Richmond. Edith Varney secures from President Davis a commission for Capt. Thorne, who is just recovering from wounds, as chief of the telegraph at Richmond. Capt. Thorne tells Edith he has been ordered away. She declares he must not go and tells him of the commission from the president. Mr. Arrelsford of the Confederate secret service, a rejected suitor of Edith's, detects Jonas, Mrs. Varney's butler carrying a note from a prisoner in Libby prison. Arrelsford suspects it is intended for Thorne. The note reads: "Attack tonight. Plan 3. Use Telegraph." Arrelsford declares Thorne is a prisoner in Libby. Edith refuses to believe and suggests that Thorne be confronted with the prisoner as a test. An order comes from General Varney for Wilfred to report to the front at once. Edith is forced to carry out her part in the test of Thorne. The prisoner is thrust into the room alone with Thorne, who recognizes him as his elder brother, Henry Dumont. They put up a fake fight and Henry accidentally kills himself. Caroline Mitford, Wilfred's sweetheart, goes to the war department telegraph office to send a message to Wilfred. Arrelsford suspects a double meaning and refuses to let it go through. He and Edith secrete themselves to watch Thorne. Whose arrival Arrelsford expects. Thorne takes charge of the telegraph office. Arrelsford and Edith see Thorne after a dispatch from the secretary of war. Thorne is shot in the wrist by Arrelsford when he attempts to send it. Arrelsford calls the guard, and when they appear Thorne turns the tables by ordering the arrest of Arrelsford. The removal of Arrelsford is stopped by the arrival of General Randolph. Thorne again begins sending the dispatch. Arrelsford protests, declaring Thorne is sending a message order to weaken the lines of defense. Thorne is saved by Miss Varney, who produces his commission as chief of telegraph. She, having seen enough to convince her he is a spy, begs him not to send the forged order. After she leaves he tears it up. Thorne plans to escape from Richmond. Arrelsford calls at the Varney home and demands to see Edith. Mrs. Varney refuses. A sergeant appears with an order to search the house for Thorne. Wilfred Varney returns from the front wounded.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Captain Thorne Justifies Himself. After the two women had left him, Wilfred stood motionless for a moment, and then sat wearily down to rest. Scarcely had he done so when he heard shouts far outside in the street, the heavy tramping of feet, cries, directions, orders. He rose and walked over to the window. The cries were growing louder and the footsteps more distinct. Men were approaching the house rapidly, he could tell that they were running. What could that be? What was toward? A suspicion flashed into his mind. It had hardly found lodgment there when Thorne sprang upon the porch, leaped across it, and burst through the other front window into the long room. A pedestal with a bust of Washington on it was standing between the windows. As Thorne sprang back from the window, he knocked against it. It fell to the floor with a tremendous crash. He stood staring a moment toward the window, listening while the noise of the running feet died away in the distance. It seemed that he had distanced his pursuers or eluded them for the time being. It could only be for a moment, however; he had other things to think of. Well, that moment would be enough; it was all he required. He turned to go down the room, only to find himself confronted by the boy.

USE SNAKES TO KILL SNAKES

South America Has Discovered an Excellent Way to Cope With the Universal Pest. In South America, where the snake pest is a very serious proposition, they are now using snakes to catch snakes. Even in the most civilized parts of Brazil over 1,000 persons are killed annually by snake bite. The mongoose, which proved so effective in Jamaica and elsewhere, is of little use here. Necessity is the mother of invention, and nature and science together have at last discovered something which it is hoped may eventually exterminate the dreadful pest. The discovery is nothing else than a "beneficial" snake which is harmless to man, and which kills and eats the poisonous species. The musurana, as it is called, is a thick, muscular snake about four feet long. It is possessed of an insatiable appetite for poisonous vipers, and it can tell of the approach of one in the same way that a pointer will "scent" game. When tackling its prey, which is frequently considerably bigger than itself, the "good" snake assumes a lethargic air as if it were gutted with food and could not fight. Seeing this the bad snake immediately attacks. This is just what the other wants; for, being rendered by nature completely immune from the poison, it seizes its enemy before it has had surprised of the two—Thorne as seeing Wilfred, or Wilfred at Thorne's appearance. The latter's face was pale, his breath was coming rapidly, he was bareheaded. His brow was covered with sweat, and he had the hunted, desperate look of a man at the very end of his resources. Neither at first said anything to the other. It was Thorne who first recovered himself. He sought to pass by the boy, but Wilfred seized him. "Halt!" he cried; "you are under arrest." "Wait a moment!" gasped out Thorne; "and I will go with you." As he spoke he shook himself loose from the weak grasp of the wounded young man, and started down the room. "Halt, I say!" cried Wilfred. "You are my prisoner." "All right, all right," said Thorne quietly; "your prisoner, anything you like. Here—" he drew his revolver from his pocket and pushed it into the boy's hand; "take this, shoot the life out of me, if you wish, but give me a chance to see my brother first." "Your brother?" "Yes. He was shot here tonight. I want one look at his face; that's all." "Where is he?" "Maybe they put him in the room across the hall yonder." "What would he be doing there?" asked Wilfred, not yet apprehending the situation from Thorne's remarks. "Nothing," said the other bitterly; "I guess he is dead." "Wait," said Wilfred. He stepped across the hall, keeping Thorne covered with his revolver. "Don't move; I will see." He threw open the door, glanced in, and then came back. "It's a lie!" he said. "What?" exclaimed Thorne. "There is no one in there. It is just one of your tricks. Call the guard!" He shouted toward the hall, and then toward the window. "Sergeant of the guard! Captain Thorne is here, in this house." He stepped out on the porch and shouted again with astonishing power for one so painfully wounded as he. Then the boy felt a faintness come over him. He sank down on a seat on the porch and leaned his head against the house, and sought to recover his strength, fighting a desperate battle; fearful lest Thorne should escape while he was thus helpless. It was Edith Varney who first replied to his frantic summons by hurrying into the room. She was as much surprised to see Thorne as he was to see her. Her heart leaped in her bosom at the sight of him, and she stared at him as at a wraith or a vision. "You wouldn't tell me an untruth, would you?" said Thorne, coming closer to her. "He was shot in this room an hour ago, my brother Henry. I'd like to take one look at his dead face before they send me the same way. Where is he? Can't you tell me that much, Miss Varney? Is he in the house?" Edith looked at his face, shook her head a little, and moved away from him toward the table. Thorne threw up his hands in a gesture of despair, and turned toward the window. As he did so, Wilfred, having recovered from his faintness a little, called out again: "The guard! The escaped prisoner, Captain Thorne!" This time his frantic outcry was answered. At last they were closing in upon the wretched man. He turned from the window and faced the girl, scarcely less wretched than he, and laughed shortly. "They are on the scent, you see," he said; "they'll get me in a minute; and when they do, it won't take them long to finish me off. And as that'll be the last of me, Miss Varney, maybe you'll listen to one thing. We can't all die a soldier's death, in the roar and glory of battle, our friends about us, under the flag we love. No, not all! Some of us have orders for another kind of work, dare-devil, desperate work, the hazardous schemes of the secret service. We fight our battles alone, no comrades to cheer us on, ten thousand to one against us, death at every turn. If we win, we escape with our lives; if we lose, we are dragged out and butchered like dogs. No soldier's grave, not even a trench with the rest of the boys—alone, despised, forgotten! These were my orders, Miss Varney; this is the death I die tonight, and I don't want you to think for one moment that I am ashamed of it; no, not for one moment." The sound of heavy feet drew nearer. Wilfred called again, while the two in the room confronted each other, the man erect, and the woman, too. A strange pain was in her heart. At least here was a man, but before she could say a word in answer to his impudently defense, the room filled with soldiers. "There's your man, sergeant," said Wilfred; "I hand him over to you." "You are my prisoner," said the sergeant. His command was reinforced by a number of others, including Corporal Matson and his squad, and some of the men of the Provost Guard, who had been chasing Thorne through the streets. At this juncture, Arrelsford, panting and breathless, also joined the company in the drawing-room. He came in rapidly, thrusting aside those in his way. "Where is he?" he cried. "Ah!" he exclaimed triumphantly, as his eye fell upon Thorne, standing quietly, surrounded by the soldiers. "We've got him, have we?" "Young Mr. Varney, here, took him, sir," said the sergeant. "So," returned Arrelsford to his prisoner, "ran down at last. Now, you will find out what it costs to play your little game with our government telegraph lines." But Thorne did not turn his head, although Arrelsford spoke almost in his ear. He looked straight at Edith Varney, and she returned his glance. "Don't waste any time, sergeant," said Arrelsford furiously. "Take him down the street and shoot him full of lead. Out with him." "Very well, sir," said the sergeant. But Wilfred interposed. He came forward, Thorne's revolver still in his hand. "No," he said decisively; "whatever he is, whatever he has done, he has the right to a trial." "The head of the secret service department said to me if I found him, to shoot him at sight," snarled Arrelsford. "I don't care what General Tarleton said, I captured this man; he's in this house, and he is not going out unless he is treated fairly." The sergeant looked uncertainly from Wilfred to Arrelsford. Mrs. Varney, who had entered with the rest of them, and who now stood by her daughter's side, looked her approval at her son. The motto of his distinguished father was surely in his veins. "Well done," said the woman softly, but not so softly that those about her did not hear; "your father would have spoken so." Arrelsford came to a sudden decision. "Well, let him have a trial. We'll give him a drumhead court-martial, but it will be the quickest ever held on earth. Stack your muskets here, and organize a court," he said. "Fall in here," cried the sergeant, at the men quickly took their places. "Attention! Stack arms! Two of you take the prisoner. Where shall we find a vacant room, ma'am?" "Across the hall," said Mrs. Varney; "where the ladies were sewing this evening." "Very good," said the sergeant. "Left face! Forward, march!" Arrelsford and Wilfred followed the soldiers. "I am the chief witness," said the former. "I will see that he gets fair play," remarked the latter, as they marched out. "I must go to Howard," said Mrs. Varney; "this excitement is killing him; I am afraid he will hardly survive the night. Caroline is with him now." "Very well, mother," said Edith, going slowly up the now deserted room and standing in the window, looking out into the night, thinking her strange, appalling thoughts. They would convict him, shoot him, there was no hope. What had he said? He was not ashamed of his work. It was the highest duty and involved the highest and noblest sacrifice, because it made the greatest demand; and they would shoot him like a mad dog. "Oh, God!" she whispered; "if some bullet would only find my heart as well."

CHAPTER XIX.

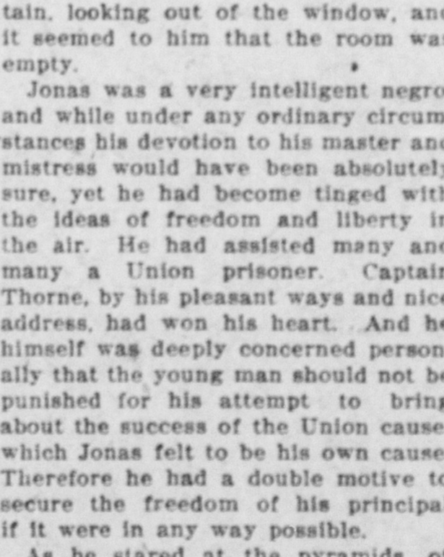

The Drumhead Court-Martial. It so happened that the soldiers who had thrust old Jonas back in his closet, whence they had taken him a short time before, in their haste, had failed to lock the door upon him. The negro, who had listened for the click of the key in the lock, had at once known of their carelessness. So soon as they had withdrawn from the room, and their search took them to other parts of the house, he had opened the door cautiously and had made his way toward the hall by the drawing-room, which he felt instinctively was the place where the exciting events of the night would soon culminate. Thorne's entry and the circumstances of his apprehension had been so engrossing that no one had given a thought to Jonas, or to any other part of the house, for that matter, and he had been able to see every thing through the hangings. He was a quick-witted old negro, and he knew, of course, that there would be but one verdict given by such a court-martial as had assembled. Now, the men who composed the court would of necessity be detailed to carry out their own sentence. The long room was filled with stacks of guns. Every soldier even those under the command of Corporal Matson in Arrelsford's department, had gone to the court-martial. There was nothing else of interest to attract them in the house. Every gun was there in that room, unguarded. A recent capture of a battalion of Federal riflemen had put the Confederates into possession of a few hundred breech-loading weapons, not of the latest and most approved pattern, for the cartridges in these guns were in cardboard shells, but still better than any the south possessed. These rifles had been distributed to some of the companies in garrison at Richmond, and it so happened that the men of the secret service squad and the provost guard had received most of them. Every gun in the stacks was of this pattern. In his earlier days, Jonas had been his young master's personal attendant, his body-servant, and as such he had often gone hunting with him. During the war he had frequently visited him in camp, charged with messages of one sort or another, and he knew all about weapons. As he stared into the long room after the departing soldiers, he did not know Edith Varney was still there, nor could he see her at all, for she was on the other side of the curtain, looking out of the window, and it seemed to him that the room was empty. Jonas was a very intelligent negro, and while under any ordinary circumstances his devotion to his master and mistress would have been absolutely sure, yet he had become tinged with the ideas of freedom and liberty in the air. He had assisted many and many a Union prisoner. Captain Thorne, by his pleasant ways and nice address, had won his heart. And he himself was deeply concerned personally that the young man should not be punished for his attempt to bring about the success of the Union cause, which Jonas felt to be his own cause. Therefore he had a double motive to secure the freedom of his principal if it were in any way possible. As he stared at the pyramids of guns, listening to the hum of conversation from the room across the hall—the door had been fortunately closed—a thought came to him. He pushed aside the portieres with which he had concealed himself, and entered the room by the back door. He moved with cat-like swiftness in the direction of the first stack of rifles. He knelt down by it, seized the nearest gun, which lay across the other three, swiftly opened the breech-clip, drew out the cartridge, looked at it a moment, put the end of it in his mouth, and crunched his strong white teeth down upon it. When he finished, he had a leaden bullet in his mouth, and the cardboard shell in his hand. He replaced the latter in the chamber and closed the breech-clip. A smile of triumph irradiated his sallow features. The gun could be fired, but whatever or whoever stood in front of it would be unharmed. He had not been quite sure that he could do this, but the result of his experiment convinced him. All the other guns were of the same character, and given the time, he could render them all harmless. He did not waste time in reflection, but started in with the same process on the others. He worked with furious haste until every bullet had been bitten off every cartridge. (TO BE CONTINUED.)

LAW IN EFFECT FOR EMPLOYES

Measure Makes Some Radical Changes In Working Hours

REST PERIODS PROVIDED

Commissioner Jackson Hopes to Have Co-operation of Employers in Enforcing Provisions—No Woman to Work More Than Six Days.

(Special Harrisburg Correspondence.) Harrisburg.—Pennsylvania's new female employment law becomes operative in November, and preparations for its enforcement are made by the department of Labor and Industry. The new law makes some radical changes in hours and provides for mid-day and rest periods. Commissioner John Price Jackson, of the department, who is charged with the enforcement of the act, said, in speaking of it, that he hoped for the co-operation of employers and employees and that the department would be reasonable and fair in carrying out its provisions. "The act will be enforced so that it will be helpful to both labor and employers in whose interest this department was created and whom it will seek faithfully and impartially to serve," said he. The most important provisions of the act are: No female may be employed more than six days or fifty-four hours in any one week, except in fruit and vegetable canneries and as nurse in hospitals, with these exceptions: In case of legal holidays three hours may be exceeded during three of the five remaining days of the same week by not more than two hours overtime in any one day, provided the weekly total of 54 is not exceeded; overtime may be allowed for time lost by stoppage of machinery for more than 30 minutes, because of alteration, accident or repair, but may not exceed two hours in any day. No female under 21 may be employed between 9 p. m. and 6 a. m., except telephone operators over 18, and no female may be employed in any manufacturing establishment between 10 p. m. and 6 a. m., except as managers, superintendents, clerks and stenographers. No female shall be allowed less than 45 minutes for the mid-day meal, except that if a female is employed less than eight hours a day this period may be reduced to thirty minutes. No female may be required to work more than six hours continuously without an interval of 45 minutes for rest. According to figures in possession of the Dairy and Food Department there were in cold storage in this State on October 1 last 10,564,861 dozens of eggs, more than enough to feed an army. Added to this there were 10,445,790 pounds of butter. Of eggs not in the shell there were stored 239,821 pounds. Of fish the middlemen had in store 3,341,487 pounds. Of poultry there was 747,772 pounds, which accounts in part for the high prices of chickens, turkeys, ducks and other fowl. Despite the fact that game is forbidden to be sold in this State, except at certain times, there are 17,477 pounds in cold storage. There are 33,325 carcasses of beef, 11,222 of veal, 142,596 of sheep and 1,275 of hogs. Of parts of carcasses not classified there are 376,136 of beef, 11,343 of veal, 30,285 of sheep and 576,217 of hogs. The State Water Supply Commission gave out a statement of an incident in its work showing how it saved $2,500 to local contractors through the operations of the flood-warning act of the last Legislature. Since the act became a law little, if any, occasion for the commission doing such work had existed until recently because of the low stage of the water. Right here in Harrisburg the commission saved the dam and river wall contractors $2,500 by telling them two days in advance that a stage high enough to carry away lumber, form-work, coffer-dams and machinery was on its way down the river. This sum is 25 per cent. of the total appropriation made by the act. The river came within about one inch of the predicted maximum height within a few hours of the time it was estimated the maximum would reach Harrisburg, these predictions having been made two days in advance. A. H. Hartwick, of State College, a former football player, was seriously ill at the Harrisburg Hospital, being taken there from a local hotel, where he had been staying for a week. Hartwick was suffering from kidney trouble and was delirious. He imagined he was in the midst of a Penn-Harvard game.
